CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

FIFTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION.

These figures, in connection with others that I have quoted during the course of these remarks, are of sufficient magnitude to show that the trade and commerce and productions of Alaska have passed beyond infantile and experimental stage

Hereafter no statement of our nation's trade, her commerce, or her resources will be complete that does not include the Territory of Alaska.

FISHING INDUSTRY OF ALASKA.

The general public living outside of Alaska have no adequate conception of the magnitude of the fishing industry and fish-canning operations in Alaska. Canned salmon is now recognized everywhere as one of the staple food products of the world. Alaska probably produces nine-tenths of the canned-salmon product of the world, and a very superior quality of fish it is, too.

I attach hereto certain statistics regarding the salmon industry of Alaska, and the location of the salmon canneries of Alaska. The statement for the year 1891 is quite complete, but, as the Treasury Department are now making up the report for the year of 1902, I can only attach a summary of the report for the year last past.

An examination of these figures show that in the year 1891 this single industry in Alaska put out a product whose aggregate value amounted to almost $7,000,000, while there was an increase this last year of $1,741,506, making the aggregate value of their product for the year 1902 $8,667,673.

These figures give some idea of the magnitude of this one industry. Surely a land that is producing such great results in this line of industry is entitled to be represented on this floor, in order that this industry may be suitably protected and safeguarded, when we are considering legislation in reference thereto.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY, DIVISION OF SPECIAL AGENTS,

Respectfully, yours,

H. M. KUTCHIN,
Special Agent.

Speaking of the salmon industry of Alaska, I desire to call to the attention of this House, as a most forcible illustration of the need for a Delegate from Alaska on this floor, a little recent history: During the first session of this present Congress the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] called up before this House for consideration a bill which he claimed with great force and earnestness was destined, if enacted into law, to protect and encourage the salmon industry in Alaska and replenish the supply of that most valuable fish. The bill was most violently attacked on this floor. I do not pause at this time to undertake to prove that the bill was good or that it was bad.

The point I make is that while we were trying to discuss that bill on this floor half a dozen members spoke on each side of this question, each one giving his version of the conditions that existed in Alaska; each of these statements were widely at variance with the others, and could not all have been correct; and yet each member relied on his understanding of conditions in Alaska as his justification for his vote on that measure. Now, no one can blame this House if we make a mistake when we have acted according to the best light we have. But when we have an opportunity to get more light and fail to avail ourselves of it, then we lay ourselves open to the just criticism of mankind.

On the occasion of that debate if we had had a well-informed Delegate from Alaska on this floor, think how much light he could have given us on this subject.

I know that some men have objected to giving Alaska a Delegate because it will cost several thousand dollars. I will get to that interesting phase of this question shortly. But I may be permitted to remark in passing that, in reference to this salmon question alone, we were trying to legislate in the dark with reference to an industry whose annual output represents $7,000,000, when, with the comparatively trifling expense of securing a Delegate, we might have always at hand the best information obtainable regarding that region and its people, with the protection of whose rights and property we are sacredly charged.

AGRICULTURE IN ALASKA.

It is not generally known to the world at large that Alaska is a region with splendid agricultural possibilities. The reason that these possibilities are not known is because every tourist that ever started for Alaska and never got farther than Wrangell or Sitka came back to the United States loaded with a highly colored assortment of misinformation, and immediately began to write hair-raising descriptions of his visit to the "frozen north," "the land of the midnight sun." He would write four columns about the glories of the Muir glacier, and the beauties of the floating iceberg, but nothing about agriculture.

Every alleged poet that never got farther west in his whole life than Poughkeepsie, N. Y., has worn the table of synonyms into a frazzle describing (?) Alaska. Here is a select sample:

Now far he sweeps, where scarce a summer smiles
On Bering's rocks or Greenland's naked isles;
Cold on his midnight watch the breezes blow,
From wastes that slumber in eternal snow;
And waft across the waves' tumultuous roar,
The wolf's long howl from Oonalaska's shore.

That is what one poet wrote about Alaska. There is enough frozen metaphor in that one stanza to blight the bloom of the Tropical Zone! [Laughter.]

Now, then, as a matter of fact which may surprise some of you gentlemen here, at Sitka, the capital of Alaska, it never gets cold enough to freeze ice in the winter; so that the residents of that portion of Alaska are obliged to ship manufactured ice from the United States to supply their wants during the summer!

There was an Alaskan prospector who had put in two winters under the shadow of the Arctic Circle. He made some money and came out to "the States" to have a good time during the winter. He was a great curiosity. People wondered how a human being could live in the intense cold of that far north.

He started for New York City. He had gotten along very well with the weather in Alaska, but when he started across the northern end of the United States in January then he discovered, in a climatic sense, that he was getting next the business end of the real thing. He was cold when he got to St. Paul; he was colder still when the breeze from the lake struck him at Chicago, and at Buffalo, N. Y., they found him frozen to death—stiff as an alpenstock, by the stove in the smoking car. [Great laughter.] That, Mr. Chairman, is a truthful recital of the sad and shocking end of Icicle Ike, of Coldfoot, Alaska. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman allow me a question? Does he think it would be kind to bring a gentleman down from Alaska to such a cold country as this?

Mr. CUSHMAN. If he did not have to come through the State of New York en route he would be all right. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. He would have to come through Washington State.

Mr. CUSHMAN. The State of Washington—that is the banana belt, where the orange blossoms grow! [Renewed laughter.]

Alaska has two valleys alone—namely, the Tanana River Valley and the Copper River Valley—which contain agricultural land equal in area to the great States of Iowa and Ohio and capable of as high a degree of cultivation as those two States. In the Tanana River Valley alone there is 50,000 square miles of the finest kind of agricultural and grazing land, while in the Copper River Valley there is 35,000 square miles of the same kind of land. C. C. Georgeson, special agent in charge of the experiment station of the Department of Agriculture in Alaska, in speaking of the Copper River Valley, says: "The Copper River Valley has a great future. It will one day be a rich and flourishing country, and perhaps the most populous region of the future State of Alaska. Here are opportunities for thousands of families to make homes for themselves and gain independence." He says further that the Government will have to make the homestead laws so liberal that it will offer an inducement for settlers to go upon the land.

In the same report there is a communication from J. Lindley Green, who has made an extended tour through the valley of the Tanana River, and in which he says: "I also found very extensive portions with a rank growth of grass. The grass is perhaps the same as the red-top grass, or herd grass, we have in the States, and this variety is found in every part of Alaska." He says that he did not find anything in any other part of the country to equal the grass in the Tanana Valley, either in quantity or quality. He further says: "This grass grows to the height of from 4 to 4½ feet, and will produce from 2 to 3 tons of hay per acre. There are places where a mowing machine can be driven for 5 miles in one direction without lifting the sickle bar. As fine a quality of hay can be produced there as can be produced anywhere. I believe spring wheat, oats, and barley will mature there if properly handled. I know that potatoes, cabbage, peas, beans, turnips, carrots, radishes, beets, and a great many other vegetables can be produced there. Agriculture could be successfully carried on in this country." After he stated that he had traveled over a great deal of the Territory of Alaska, he states that "in the Tanana Valley agriculture could be carried on very successfully."

At page 340 of the same report Professor Georgeson says: "The mineral resources of the Territory have not been fathomed. We only know that they are vast and it must take a long time to exhaust them. But great as is this hidden wealth, it can not build a State unaided. If agriculture is not developed in the Territory, Alaska must forever remain what it now is. Alaska can furnish homesteads of 320 acres each to 200,000 families. She has abundant resources to support a population of at least 3,000,000 people." "The reason," he says, "that Alaska is not settled is because the settlers can not get title to land, and as the laws are now, at best he is only allowed 80 acres." Professor Georgeson states that 320 acres would be more in harmony with the conditions, which require considerable pasture lands to make farming a success.

Secretary of Agriculture Wilson is now seeking an appropriation by Congress whereby he can experiment with Polled Angus cattle in Alaska, and predicts that if Congress will pass a liberal land law thousands of Americans will go to that country, which he believes to be one of the greatest future stock-raising countries in the world, as well as a great grass country; therefore the great wealth of Alaska will come from her agricultural possibilities. Notwithstanding the immense amounts of gold that Alaska will give to the world, agriculture and stock raising will be the future great wealth and foundation upon which to build and support a great population in that country.

The March number (1902) of the National Geographic Magazine contains a brief article upon the conditions in and the possibilities of Alaska, by C. C. Georgeson, of Sitka, Alaska, he being a special agent of the United States Department of Agriculture in charge of the agricultural investigations in Alaska. This article is not lengthy, but it contains so much general and valuable information and corrects so many false opinions regarding Alaska that I herewith incorporate the same into my remarks:

THE POSSIBILITIES OF ALASKA.

[By C. C. Georgeson, of Sitka, Alaska, special agent of United States Department of Agriculture in charge of Alaska investigations.]

He would have been considered a rash prophet who five years ago had the temerity to predict that Alaska would one day become a great and powerful State.

Yet, to-day, such a prediction would not be ascribed to prophetic sight, but simply a common-sense view, a foregone conclusion, based on the resources and possibilities inherent in the Territory. The change of opinion is due to the fact that it has been demonstrated that Alaska has agricultural possibilities of a high order. The development of agriculture will enhance the value of the other vast and varied resources of the Territory a thousandfold. It will make it possible to work the extensive placer mines not rich enough in gold to pay at the present prices for foodstuffs, as well as the enormous deposits of low-grade quartz ores found nearly everywhere in the mountains.

Alaska has been maligned, abused, and totally misunderstood. It has been regarded as a frozen, worthless waste, whose only value consisted in its seal fisheries, and totally incapable of furnishing homes for a civilized people. These ideas are still current even in quarters where one would naturally expect to find a knowledge of the facts. Through the instrumentality of Secretary Seward, Alaska was purchased from Russia in 1867 for the sum of $7,200,000. It has already paid for itself many times over, and still we have scarcely begun to realize how enormous the resources are. What the profits to the lessees of the sealing privilege have been will probably never be made known, but it is interesting to note that the rentals received or due the Government for the lease of this privilege from 1870 to 1895 amounted to almost the original cost of the Territory, namely, $7,192,540.41 (Senate Document No. 81, Fifty-fourth Congress, second session); and as to the income from mines, it is commonly reported that more than an equal sum has been taken from a single mine near Juneau, to say nothing of the millions taken out in other places.

Alaska has an area of 591,000 square miles, in round numbers; that is to say, it is as large as all of the United States east of the Mississippi River, exclusive of the four States of Florida, Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi. It requires an effort of the mind to grasp the significance of such an expanse of territory. There never could be a greater misconception in regard to a geographical fact than the popular idea that it is a snow-covered, inhospitable waste, and it is strange that this idea should be so persistently propagated and disseminated among the people. As a matter of fact, you can travel from one end of the Yukon to the other in summer time and never see snow. You see, on the contrary, a tangle of luxuriant vegetation, large forests, and such delicacies as wild raspberries, red currants, huckleberries, and cranberries in profusion. In places the grass grows as high as a man's shoulder. At Holy Cross Mission I desired to photograph some cattle, native born, reared by the fathers, and for that purpose asked that they be turned into a meadow reserved for hay. To my astonishment I found that the cattle were totally out of sight when they got into the grass, which reached above their backs.

Alaskan tourists are largely responsible for the false conception which is abroad in regard to the agricultural possibilities of the country. The high mountain range which skirts the sea coast is covered with snow and glaciers. It has a rugged, forbidding aspect. People who go as far north as Skagway and back again to Seattle in a two weeks' trip fondly imagine that they are studying Alaska, and that they are quite prepared to pass judgment on the whole Territory, when, as a matter of fact, they have not been within 200 miles of the one hundred and forty-first meridian, where Alaska proper begins. To get anything like a correct idea of Alaska, one must go inside.

WHAT EXPERIMENT HAS PROVED.

Facts ought to carry greater weight than theories founded on misconception. Now, the facts are that all the hardy vegetables are grown with marked success all over Alaska south of the arctic circle, except on the coast of Bering Sea. I have never seen finer potatoes, cauliflower, cabbage, kale, peas, lettuce, and radishes than have been grown at the experiment stations at Sitka and Kenai. At Dawson I have seen a magnificent display of native-grown vegetables comprising all the hardy kinds; and at the chamber of commerce rooms of that town are displayed fine samples of barley, oats, and wheat in many varieties, perfectly normal in all particulars, and grown there by a local experimenter. At Eagle I have seen all the foregoing crops, and in addition a luxuriant growth of sweet peas, poppies, mignonette, and a host of other flowers in full bloom.

At Holy Cross Mission I ate new potatoes, cauliflower, cabbage, carrots, beets, lettuce, and radishes in the beginning of August, all produced in the mission gardens. At Rampart, in latitude 65, a station was established by the Department of Agriculture in the summer of 1900. Winter rye, seeded there in August of that year, lived through the winter perfectly under a good covering of snow. Although the temperature fell to 70° below zero, it came out in the spring in perfect condition, and matured grain by the first of August, 1901. Barley seeded in May of the latter year was ripe by the middle of August. At the headquarters station at Sitka I have for three years past grown as fine spring wheat as one could wish to see (samples of it may be seen at the Department of Agriculture), and barley and oats have been grown there successfully for four years. These grains have likewise been grown successfully at the experiment station at Kenai, on the Kenai Peninsula. This station is situated in a region where there are thousands of square miles of land available for farming and grazing.

Capt. W. R. Abercrombie, who constructed the trans-Alaskan military road, at my request seeded the past summer small quantities of wheat, barley, and oats at Copper Center, in the Copper River Valley, and he writes me that they all matured. Ripe oats were seen last September by Mr. Isaac Jones, an employee of the Department of Agriculture, on a tributary to the Forty-mile, in about latitude 64. Two Wisconsin men, Messrs. H. C. Nicolai and D. H. Clark, started to farm at Skagway two years ago. In September of last year I saw considerable fields of oats, potatoes, and cabbage grown by them. On Admiralty Island, near Killisnoo, a man named Thomas Baker has been growing vegetables and grains for years with noted success. Small patches of grain have been matured at Kadiak, at Afognak, at the Moravian Mission, on the Kuskokwim River, and at many other places. At Fort Selkirk an American named Frank Bach and at Dawson two brothers named Morgan, also Americans, have secured from the Canadian government tracts of upward of a hundred acres of land each, which they are farming successfully.

STOCK RAISING.

Cattle are kept at every considerable settlement in Alaska, except perhaps at Nome. They all do well. The treeless region to the westward of Sitka is especially well suited to cattle and all kinds of live stock. The Alaska Commercial Company has kept cattle, sheep, and Angora goats at Kodiak for many years, and they required but little feed and shelter, except in an occasional storm during winter. The data on these experiments were published in the report to Congress on the Alaska investigations for 1899. The natives at Kenai and Ninilchik, on Cook Inlet, have kept cattle for half a century or more. At the latter place they have upward of 30 head. But few breeding cattle have as yet found their way into the interior, but horses are quite numerous there.

In this connection it is of interest to note that in spite of the extremely cold winters in the interior there are many instances on record in which horses abandoned by prospectors in the fall have survived the winters and come out in the spring in fair condition. Mr. Mark E. Bray, an American miner, told me last summer that he used five mules in his mining operations on one of the tributaries of the Tanana. He abandoned them when he went out in the fall, it being too expensive to buy feed for them in Dawson, where he wintered. When he returned to the diggings the following April he found four of them alive and well; the fifth had been killed by the Indians. In the fall of 1899 Mr. Jack Dalton turned loose 45 head of pack horses he had used in carrying provisions over the Dalton trail, and in the spring of 1900 he found 43 of them alive and well and in fair condition.

AGRICULTURAL LANDS.

There are extensive areas of grass land in many parts of the interior. Mr. Isaac Jones, already referred to, made a reconnoissance last summer between Eagle, on the Yukon, and Valdes, on Prince William Sound. The distance between these two points as the trail runs is about 435 miles. He examined some 15 miles on either side of the trail, thus covering an area of 30 miles wide by 435 miles long. Within the boundaries of this strip he estimates that he saw 2,000,000 acres of pasture and farming land. In the region occupied by the Kechumstuk Indians, north of the Tanana, and especially along the South Fork of the Forty-mile, he reports that he crossed a meadow with the grass waist high for a distance of 8 miles. He also learned of horses which had run at large for two years in this region. The Kechumstuk Indians have given a new name to cattle. They call them "McKinley moose," and Americans were known to them as "McKinley men." The chief of the village had secured an American flag, which he hoisted on a tall pole whenever he learned that white men were in his territory. There is some hope for the civilization of a tribe which cherishes such sentiments. Mr. Jones's description of the country is highly interesting. It forms part of my report now before Congress.

WHAT IT MEANS.

The development of agriculture in Alaska means the settlement and development of the Territory. It means the making of homes, a permanent population, the rapid development of the mineral resources, the creation of wealth, the building of a State. If, on the other hand, no foodstuffs can be produced in Alaska, a large population is impossible, and it could never become a State. We can not imagine the possibility of sustaining even 100,000 people there if all that they required to support life must be brought from the States, a thousand miles distant, and carried hundreds of miles more from the ports of entry to the mining camps and villages in the interior. Under such conditions development of the natural resources must languish. Agriculture is the backbone of prosperity.

An adequate food supply is the first essential to the growth of population, to prosperity, to greatness, and if this factor were lacking in Alaska it would be doomed to remain a scantily populated Territory. States with little or no agriculture make no growth. Look at Nevada, for instance. But it is fortunate for Alaska, and therefore for the whole country, for the growth of any section benefits the whole, that she has agricultural possibilities to an extent which will make the fullest development of her resources practicable. Alaska can furnish homesteads of 320 acres each to 200,000 families. She has abundant resources to support a population of at least 3,000,000 people. Such a population would mean a volume of trade which would yield an immense and permanent income to the coast States. There are people who fear that the development of agriculture would prejudice the mining interests. Nothing could be further from the truth. On the contrary, it would be of the greatest possible help to the mining industry. It would reduce the cost of living, make labor more plentiful, and therefore cheaper, and give rise to better transportation facilities. It would then become possible to work the low-grade mines with profit and to materially increase the profits of the good mines.

THE EXAMPLE OF FINLAND.

The foregoing statements are borne out by the example of Finland. This little country lies wholly north of the sixtieth parallel. Alaska reaches 6 degrees south of this latitude. Finland is less than one-fourth the size of Alaska, and its agricultural area is less than 50,000 square miles; yet in 1898 Finland had a population of over 2,600,000 souls. Agriculture is the chief industry. Only about 300,000 people are city dwellers. They export large quantities of dairy products, live stock, flax, hemp, and considerable grain, and the population has increased some 825,000 in the last twenty eight-years, and this in spite of a very considerable emigration.

The conditions in Alaska from an agricultural standpoint are more favorable than those of Finland. We have a larger agricultural area, somewhat warmer summers, and the mines will yield the best possible home market. When the fishing industry of Alaska is developed it will engage the labors of hundreds of thousands of people, who must be fed in large measure from the farms. Alaska has a coast line of 26,000 miles, practically all of which affords splendid fishing ground. The salmon is as yet the only fish which has attracted attention. There are thousands of square miles of cod banks; the enormous halibut grounds have not been touched, and the myriad shoals of herring go by unheeded. An oil and guano factory has been established for some years at Killisnoo, a little village some distance from Sitka, in which the herring is utilized. There is room for 50 such enterprises. The guano sells readily for $30 per ton.

WHY ALASKA IS NOT SETTLED.

With such facts as to resources, why is Alaska not settled? Simply because settlers can not get title to land. There is much inquiry for land, but when the would-be settler learns the status of affairs he changes his plans. To get title the settler must first buy soldiers' additional homestead scrip, which can be located on unsurveyed lands. This will cost him anywhere from $5 to $15 an acre. Then he must deposit in the surveyor-general's office an amount which will cover the cost of the survey. United States deputy surveyors charge $15 to $20 a day and traveling expenses in Alaska. He must also pay for the office work, entries, etc. The result of all this is that a piece of raw land in Alaska will cost him as much as a good, improved farm in almost any State. Such conditions are prohibitive, and Alaska will not be settled as long as they prevail. Again, a homestead of 80 acres, which the law allows, is not large enough. Stock raising must of necessity become a leading branch in Alaska farming, and 80-acre stock farms will scarcely be much in demand. Three hundred and twenty acres would be more in harmony with conditions which require considerable pasture land to make farming a success.

Would it not be a wise policy to make the land absolutely free to bona fide settlers? The great expense necessary to reach the Territory with work animals, implements, and all that is required for a start, and the hardships incident to pioneer life in a rigorous climate far from civilization, entitle the pioneer to special consideration. The development of the Territory depends upon his work. He must blaze the way and bear the brunt of the battle. His courage, endurance, and self-sacrifice constitute the very foundations on which the State must be reared. The exploitation of the Territory's resources by wealthy corporations will not enrich or build the State. It is the pioneer, the settler, the home maker, who, with ax and grubbing hoe, subdues the wilderness and forces unwilling nature to yield him a livelihood; who nurtures a family; who rears the schoolhouse and church. It is he who is the State builder, and every practicable means employed to aid him in the onerous task will further the development of the Territory.

Respectfully,

GEO. E. ROBERTS,
Director of the Mint.

It would really seem that a region that in the past three years has been annually pouring out a gold production of over $7,600,000 per annum ought to be entitled to some kind of representation on this floor. I surely hope no member will object to the passage of this pending bill to give to the people of Alaska a Delegate on the ground of the cost. It will ill become us to turn toward a people whose hardihood and whose pluck have been the means of producing so much wealth and say to them that we are opposed to their having a Delegate because it costs too much.

LAND LAWS OF ALASKA.

A most peculiar and anomalous condition exists in Alaska with reference to the land laws for that region.

The general land laws of the United States have heretofore by Congressional enactment been extended to Alaska. But, by reason of the peculiar conditions existing in Alaska, these laws are not applicable and are absolutely inoperative. This peculiar situation has tended to produce great confusion in the minds of many as to just what extent the land laws relating to Alaska are in force therein. The land laws are in force in Alaska, but the local condition is such that they are absolutely inoperative. In legal phraseology, this situation might aptly be termed a right without a remedy.

The confusion in the general mind on this subject has been heightened by the fact that the legislation in reference to the public and mineral lands of Alaska had been enacted piecemeal, and the various acts relating to the same are scattered through the statutes here and there.

In order to place in the RECORD a statement on the land law in Alaska that would be both brief and comprehensive, and at the same time one that would be recognized as reliable, I requested the Commissioner of the General Land Office of the United States to prepare for me a careful and comprehensive statement on this subject. I have received said statement from him embodied in two letters, which I will insert herein:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., March 29, 1902.

Hon. FRANCIS W. CUSHMAN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Replying to your favor of yesterday, in which you request information as to the extent to which the public land laws of the United States have been extended and are now in force in Alaska, I beg to call your attention to the fact that by section 8, act of May 17, 1884 (23 Stat., 24), it is provided that—

"The land laws of the United States relating to mining claims and the rights incident thereto shall, from and after the passage of this act, be in full force and effect in said district, under the administration thereof hereinafter provided for, subject to such regulations as may be made by the Secretary of the Interior, approved by the President."

Since the passage of this act the mineral laws have remained in force in that district to the same extent and under the same conditions in which they are operative within the United States.

The act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stat., 1095), authorized entries of lands in that district for town site and for trade and business purposes. Section 12 of that act provides:

"That any citizen of the United States over 21 years of age, and any association of such citizens, and any corporation incorporated under the laws of the United States or of any State or Territory of the United States now authorized by law to hold lands in the Territories now or hereafter in possession of and occupying public lands of Alaska for the purposes of trade and business, may purchase not to exceed 160 acres, to be taken as near as practicable in the square form."

Section 10 of the act of May 14, 1898 (30 Stat., 413), limits the amount of land which may be taken for the purposes of trade and business to 80 acres.

Section 1 of said act provides:

"That the homestead land laws of the United States and the rights incident thereto, including the right to enter surveyed or unsurveyed lands under provisions of law relating to acquisition of title through soldiers' additional homestead rights, are hereby extended to Alaska, subject to such regulations as made by the Secretary of Interior. * * * Provided, That no entry shall be allowed extending more than 80 rods along the shore of any navigable water; and along such shore a space of at least 80 rods shall be reserved from entry between all such claims. And nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to authorize entries to be made or title to be acquired to the shore of any navigable waters within the said district. And it is further provided, That no homestead shall exceed 80 acres in extent."

Sections 2 to 9 of the same act authorize rights of way to be granted for certain purposes through the public lands in that district.

Section 11 of that act provides:

"That the Secretary of the Interior, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, may cause to be appraised the timber or any part thereof upon the public lands in the District of Alaska, and may from time to time sell and so dispose thereof as he may deem proper, for not less than the appraised value thereof, in such quantities to each purchaser as he shall prescribe, to be used in the District of Alaska, but not for export therefrom. And such sales shall at all times be limited to actual necessities for consumption in the District from year to year. * * * The Secretary of the Interior may permit, under regulations to be prescribed by him, the use of timber found upon the public lands in said District of Alaska by actual settlers, residents, individual miners, and prospectors for mineral, for firewood, fencing, buildings, mining, prospecting, and for domestic purposes, as may actually be needed by such persons for such purposes."

The act of March 31, 1899 (30 Stat., 1098), provided that "the system of public-land surveys is hereby extended to the district of Alaska."

The act of June 16, 1900, provides:

"That so much of the public-land laws of the United States are hereby extended to the district of Alaska as relate to coal lands; namely, sections 2347-2352, inclusive, of the Revised Statutes."

The acts above enumerated embrace all of the laws now in force which extend the operation of any of the public-lands laws to that district.

Since it may be interesting to you to refer briefly to the proposed legislation introduced at the present session of Congress on this subject, I beg to call your attention to House bill 227, entitled "An act to amend section 1 of the act of Congress approved May 14, 1898," and H. R. 231, entitled "A bill amending the act entitled 'An act to authorize the entry of lands chiefly valuable for building stone,' approved August 4, 1892, and making it applicable to Alaska."

The only lands surveyed in that district are those surveyed under the laws permitting mineral entries, entries for trade and business, or for the location of soldiers' additional homestead rights. None have been surveyed into sections and townships. The last annual report of this office shows that of the 368,101,444 acres (estimated) in that district but 2,236 acres have been surveyed.

If you find that I can be of further service in this matter I will very gladly respond to any additional suggestions you may make.

Yours, truly,

BINGER HERMANN, Commissioner.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 14, 1903.

Hon. FRANCIS W. CUSHMAN,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR SIR: Referring to your verbal request, I will supplement my letter of March 29, 1902, by mentioning the fact that the only law enacted which specifically refers to public lands in Alaska, and which was not mentioned in that letter, is the act of February 14, 1902 (31 Stat., p. 20), which provides that on and after June 1 last the number of land districts in Alaska should be reduced to one, the location to be fixed by the President; and the same act, on page 22 of the same volume of statutes, where an appropriation of $90,000 was made to continue the investigation of the mineral resources.

The only proposed legislation affecting Alaska which has been called to my attention since that date is House bill 12038, entitled "An act to amend an act extending the homestead laws to Alaska," etc., and Senate bill 4616, to grant title to certain parcels of land to the town of Juneau.

So far as I have been informed, these bills are still pending before Congress.

I herewith return my letter of March 29, above referred to, which you left with me on the occasion of your visit to-day.

Yours, truly,

BINGER HERMANN, Commissioner.

A brief summary of the situation in Alaska with reference to the public lands is about as follows:

Mining laws in Alaska.—That the mining laws of the United States are in full force in Alaska.

Homestead law in Alaska.—That the homestead law has been extended to Alaska with the limitation that only 80 acres may be taken instead of 160; however, the lands in Alaska not now being surveyed, it is impossible to take up a homestead of even 80 acres.

Trade and town-site act.—Under the land laws as extended to Alaska not to exceed 640 acres may be taken for town-site purposes, and 80 acres may be taken for trade or business.

Coal-land laws.—The United States land laws relating to coal lands have been extended to Alaska, but filings on coal lands in Alaska must, under said law, be made on surveyed lands, and there are no surveyed lands in Alaska.

Laws relating to surveys in Alaska.—The United States laws relating to the survey of the public lands have been extended to Alaska, but no survey of the public domain in Alaska has been had thereunder.

There are several propositions relating to the land laws of Alaska that strike me with peculiar force. In the first place, why should the homestead right in Alaska be limited to 80 acres? If the land is worthless, nobody will take up a homestead. If the land is good, citizens of the United States ought to be permitted to take it up.

The present law only permits the homesteader in Alaska to take 80 acres, instead of 160. I venture to say the man does not live who can produce an ounce of logic to justify that limitation of law as applied to Alaska.

It is frequently stated that the land in Alaska is worthless for agricultural purposes. That is not correct. But if it is of a poorer nature generally than the land elsewhere, then any man who is bold enough to try to make his living from Alaska soil ought to be permitted to take more of the land instead of less.

I am in favor of the bill now pending before this Congress, under which (if it shall pass) every homesteader in Alaska shall have the right to take not only 160 acres but 320 acres as a homestead.

In the last portion of the letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office it is stated that the laws relating to the survey of public lands have been extended to Alaska. Understand me now, it is the law relating to the survey that has been extended to Alaska, not the survey itself.

The statement is made in the Commissioner's letter that out of 368,101,144 acres in Alaska there has been surveyed the stupendous area of 2,236 acres! That statement would be ridiculous if it were not pathetic. I do not recall but one incident in all my experience which reminds me of this condition.

A number of years ago some miners were prospecting in the State of Washington, and having found a very inviting prospect they selected one of their number to take the "cayuse" and go a hundred miles to the nearest town for the necessary supplies—commonly known as a "grub stake."

He was gone a long time and had a great many mishaps and misfortunes, but when he finally returned and the outfit was unpacked and inspected it was found to consist of a barrel of whisky and one loaf of bread. The assembled miners surveyed the supplies for a little while in silence, and then the patriarch of the camp exclaimed, "Great God, Bill, what do you expect to do with all that bread?"

The question that is now agitating me most keenly is, what on earth are we going to do with all that surveyed land in Alaska?

In order to fully understand the direct connection that exists between the extension of the homestead laws to Alaska and the Government surveys being extended to the lands in Alaska I would state:

The homestead law of the United States only permits the citizen to locate his homestead on public land that has been surveyed. Now, then, practically none of the land in Alaska has ever been surveyed. Therefore, when you speak of the homestead laws being extended to Alaska, the statement is grossly misleading. To extend the homestead laws to any portion of the United States without at the same time extending the Government surveys is like producing the play of Hamlet with the melancholy Dane left out.

At this session of Congress this House has already passed a bill (H. R. 12098, passed the House December 6, 1902) increasing the amount of land which a homesteader may take in Alaska from 80 acres to 320 acres. This bill is now pending before the Senate and should pass at this session.

There is one important change in that bill that should be made in the Senate, and the amendment subsequently agreed to in this House; that is, an amendment to this bill permitting the homesteader in Alaska to take his homestead on either surveyed or unsurveyed lands. Such a law has heretofore been passed in regard to some of our Western States where the public domain had not been surveyed, and it proved to be an excellent measure.

When the homesteader is permitted to settle on unsurveyed land, he simply stakes out his homestead like a miner would stake out a mining claim. The only restriction on him should be that in staking out his homestead on unsurveyed public lands in Alaska the lines of his homestead claim should run north and south and east and west. Then, after he has resided on this land five years and proved up, he gets title to this land, whether the public surveys have been extended over this region or not. When the public surveys are extended over this region, the lines of his homestead remain just as he originally staked them out.

Now, that is the kind of a land law that Alaska needs, and the enactment of such a law as that will do more for the promotion of industry, the permanent settlement, and the speedy development of Alaska than everything else combined that has been done for that Territory since it passed from under the dominion of the Czar.

LICENSE LAW OF ALASKA.

On March 3, 1899, Congress enacted a license tax law for the district of Alaska, on occupations and business, and not on property. The legislation was unprecedented—in one case particularly, a liquor dealer pays $25 a year for a retail liquor license. This is collected by the collector of internal revenue for Oregon, to which Alaska is attached for internal-revenue purposes. By the license tax law of Alaska, passed as above stated, the liquor dealer is required to pay for the privilege of engaging in business an additional tax. This tax is graduated—where the population is 1,000 or less, $500; more than 1,000, $1,500, per year.

On June 6, 1900, Congress passed a civil code for the district of Alaska. This code provided for the incorporation of towns in Alaska, and further provided that one-half of the license money collected by the Government within the incorporated towns should be turned over to the municipality to be used exclusively for school purposes. In 1901 Congress amended it still further by providing that if it was shown to the judge of the district court where the incorporated town was situated that 50 per cent was not required for school purposes, all over and above that required for school purposes could be used by the council for general and municipal purposes.

There is a bill to amend the civil code now pending before the Senate which provides that all the license money collected within incorporated towns shall go to the municipality, not less than 25 per cent for school purposes, nor more than 50 per cent, and the balance to the municipality.

Under this license law for Alaska a license is required by the United States Government of all people in Alaska engaging in almost every conceivable kind of business.

Requiring this license of the inhabitants of Alaska before they are permitted to engage in business simply amounts to levying a tax, equal to the amount of the license, on each branch of business prosecuted in Alaska. The provisions of this license law are found in chapter 44 of the Criminal Code of Alaska, being the act approved March 3, 1899.

Under the provisions of this law a license or tax is levied upon almost every conceivable business in Alaska. For instance, I quote here some of the different kinds of business in that Territory upon which a license tax is levied: Abstract offices, banks, boarding houses, brokers, breweries, cigar manufacturers, public docks, wharves, and warehouses, fisheries, freight and passenger transportation lines, hotels, insurance agents, mines, mercantile establishments, meat markets, manufactories, physicians, planing mills, pawnbrokers, pedlers, patent-medicine venders, restaurants, real estate dealers, ships and shipping, sawmills, steam ferries, toll roads or trails, tramways, transfer companies, taxidermists, theaters, waterworks.

The provisions of this law have an alphabetical range from A to W, covering all business and property included within this range. One prominent resident of Alaska facetiously remarked that the only thing that prevented the American Congress from levying a tax on zebras was not the matter of Congressional modesty, but the climatic difficulty of rearing those animals in Alaska.

Now, then, under the provisions of this license tax law, which has been in force and effect in Alaska since July 1, 1899, the United States Government has collected from the citizens of Alaska the sum of almost $400,000.

This money has not been left in Alaska for benefit and development of that country or for the aid of the inhabitants thereof, but has been placed in the United States Treasury to help pay the debts and running expenses of the General Government.

The history of the United States Government from the organization of the thirteen original States clear down to the last tick of the clock does not contain a parallel in our treatment of any other Territory to that which we have accorded to Alaska.

In other Territories we have made appropriations directly from the United States Treasury to build up and develop the Territory. In the case of Alaska we have levied an unwarranted and indefensible tax on them to help build up the rest of the Federal domain.

I make free to say that there is in all our annals no precedent for our peculiar treatment of Alaska.

The American Congress, as the lawmaking body having jurisdiction over the Territories of the United States, owes it to itself and to them to repeal the Alaska license law to the very last line and letter.

It is hard enough for the pioneers of our country to develop the resources of our far-away frontier unencumbered, and there is no excuse for our levying tax upon their industry and demanding tribute of their toil.

Bill to grant title to school lands to city of Juneau, S. 4616.

The foregoing list shows that there have been during this session of Congress 30 bills introduced in the House and 10 in the Senate relating to Alaska. An examination of these bills shows that they relate to 28 different subjects, and all of them are important.

Now then, in attempting to consider the legislation contemplated in all these bills, I say there is not a man on the floor of this House who has more than a slight and general knowledge concerning any of these subjects or the conditions which exist in Alaska affecting these various matters.

This state of affairs shows conclusively that if we are going to try to legislate for Alaska that we need someone on this floor who is intimately acquainted with the conditions in that region to furnish us information on all these various topics.

Permit me to remark, Mr. Chairman, that it is a most difficult task we are called upon to perform in this Chamber, to wit, legislating in regard to the rights and for the benefit of 76,000,000 of people.

Oftentimes in this Chamber it becomes a most difficult task for us to enact a law that will meet a certain emergency or relieve a given condition.

But how much more difficult, aye, how utterly impossible becomes our task when we are asked and required to legislate to relieve a certain condition and we have no way of absolutely informing ourselves exactly what that condition is or what controlling causes produced the condition.

And yet that is exactly the condition in which this body is often placed when we are trying to consider legislation for Alaska. I have seen it half a dozen times on this floor in my short service in this body.

NEED FOR A DELEGATE.

Not only are the Alaskan people entitled to a Delegate in Congress for their benefit, but we, as members of this lawmaking body, ought to give them a Delegate for our own benefit.

There should be some man on this floor authorized to speak authoritatively for the people and the interests of that mighty region.

There should be some man here whose credentials would make him responsible to us for what he says on this floor, and who would also, by reason of his position, be responsible to the people at home who elect him.

At present we are dependent for our information regarding Alaska on anyone we may be able to pick up from that region. At the present time every piece of humanity that happens to blow in upon us from that far-away region, be he wise or foolish, drunk or sober, immediately proclaims himself to be the only simon-pure, washed-in-the-wool, blown-in-the-bottle, fully authorized, and properly labeled walking delegate from Alaska! [Laughter.] Now, then, when we are considering in this body legislation for a region as big as that portion of the United States east of the Mississippi River, legislation that affects property rights and commerce that mount in their aggregate value into the millions of dollars, we ought not to be dependent for our information on any and every piece of human flotsam and jetsam that the Alaskan tide happens to deposit at our door!

I desire to insert at this point in my remarks certain tables, letters, statements, and statistics relating to Alaska, which have a bearing upon this bill we are now discussing:

POPULATION OF DIFFERENT STATES AT THE DATE OF THEIR ADMISSION, AND AMOUNT OF TERRITORY THEREIN.

Thirty-two States have joined the Union since the adoption of the Federal Constitution. Most singularly there have been contests over the admission of a large majority of them, in some instances resulting in long delays.

THE PROVISIONS OF THE BILL.

I now desire to pass from the subject of my general remarks upon conditions in Alaska to the special provisions of this bill designed to give the people of that Territory a Delegate in Congress.

I shall endeavor to briefly explain the exact provisions of this bill and give some of the reasons which induced the Committee on the Territories to present the bill in its present form.

I ask all members of the Committee of the House to bear in mind that I speak now of the provisions of H. R. 16653, the bill which is pending and which will be offered as a substitute, and that I am not now speaking of H. R. 9865, in lieu of which the substitute at the proper time will be offered.

QUALIFICATIONS OF THE DELEGATE.

This bill provides that the qualifications of this Delegate shall be the same qualifications which the United States Constitution requires of members of Congress, to wit, to have attained the age of 25 years and have been seven years a citizen of the United States. This bill adds the further provision, of course, that at the time said Delegate is elected he shall be a resident of the Territory of Alaska. I hardly think that provision was necessary in the bill, for I do not conceive that the people of Alaska would ever select anyone to represent them in the capacity of a Delegate who was not a resident of Alaska.

POWERS AND DUTIES OF SAID DELEGATE.

The Delegate whose election is provided for under this bill will have the same powers, duties, and privileges as are exercised and enjoyed by Delegates from the other Territories. There is only one matter in which the Delegate provided for in this bill would not stand upon an exact plane with all Delegates from other Territories, and that one matter is that this bill does not make as generous a provision for the mileage of the Delegate from Alaska as the law accords to Delegates from other Territories.

THE MILEAGE QUESTION.

One of the questions that has been discussed somewhat at length in connection with this bill is, What, if any, allowance should be made to the Delegate from Alaska (for I assume that the House is going to pass this bill in some form) for his mileage or traveling expenses?

Now, I want to ask the attention of the members of this House for a moment or two while I make a short, clear, statement on this mileage question. I will tell you what the present law is on the subject of the mileage of Members and Delegates, and then I will tell you what provision this bill makes on that subject; and then the House can determine for itself whether it desires to approve the provisions of this bill relating to the mileage of the Delegate, or to make some changes therein.

Under the present law every other Delegate and every Member of Congress is allowed, under existing law, 20 cents per mile each way by the shortest route of ordinary travel from his residence to the Capitol at Washington City; and this allowance is made to each Member and Delegate once for every attendance upon a regular session of Congress.

Now, then, my idea was to make the provisions of this bill such that the Delegate from Alaska, if the election of one is authorized, will stand upon an exact plane with every other Member and Delegate in reference to his allowance for mileage. However, there was a wide diversity of opinion on that subject among the members of the Committee on Territories, which committee considered and reported this bill. In deference to these differing opinions, the provisions of this bill that relate to the allowance for mileage to said Delegate are somewhat in the nature of a compromise.

Instead of providing that said Delegate shall receive the usual mileage allowed to Members and Delegates, this bill provides:

Provided, however, That such Delegate in lieu of all other allowances shall, in addition to his salary, receive the sum of $1,500 per annum, which shall cover all mileage and other expenses except stationery allowance and compensation for clerk hire.

I am perfectly frank with you in stating that I am so anxious to get this bill through and secure a Delegate for the people of Alaska that I will accept any provision in reference to mileage that this House in its wisdom wants to insert in this bill. The Delegate is the important thing to me in this legislation, and not the mileage.

My suggestion in reference to this matter, however, would be to so frame this bill that the new Delegate from Alaska shall stand upon an exactly equal plane with reference to mileage with every other Member and Delegate that has ever been elected to this body. I know of no reason why we should pay the native Hawaiian who is the Delegate from that Territory full allowance, 20 cents per mile traveling expenses by land and water, and then in this bill discriminate against a native-born American citizen who comes to us as a Delegate from Alaska. But, as I said, I am willing to accept the judgment of this House on this point, whatever it may be. I would be glad to get the bill passed if it did not make any allowance for mileage.

However, in connection with the matter of the mileage to be allowed to the Delegate from Alaska, and in closing my remarks upon that portion of this bill, I will place before this House the following facts and data, which will aid the House in its decision on this mileage question:

Mileage in Alaska, etc.

From—	To—	Miles.
Tacoma, Wash	Sitka, Alaska	[a]1,108.70
Do	Skagway, Alaska	1,035
Do	Juneau, Alaska	934
Skagway, Alaska	White Horse	109.79
White Horse, Alaska	Dawson	443.21
Dawson	St. Michael	1,028
Tacoma, Wash	Nome	2,407
Nome	St. Michael	115
Do	Unalaska	645
Unalaska	Skagway	1,989

[a] Inside pass.

Mileage of Delegate from Alaska figured at different points in Alaska to Washington City, at the figure of 20 cents per mile each way, or 40 cents per mile one way:

Juneau to Washington City, 4,465 miles (40 cents)	$1,786.00
Skagway to Washington City, 4,566 miles (40 cents)	1,826.40
Nome to Washington City, 5,938 miles (40 cents)	2,375.20
Circle City to Washington, 5,179 miles (40 cents)	2,071.60

The foregoing figures show what mileage a Delegate from Alaska would draw, if he resided at any of the above points in Alaska, in attending each regular session of Congress, if said Delegate shall be allowed the same rate of mileage that is now accorded to other Members and Delegates.

DELEGATE FROM HAWAII.

Act of April 30, 1900, provided that a Delegate to Congress shall be elected by the qualified voters of Hawaii. Such Delegate from Hawaii is entitled to a seat in the House of Representatives with the right of debate, but not of voting. His salary as such Delegate is $5,000 per year, and mileage at 20 cents per mile each way; the distance traveled from Hawaii to Washington City being 5,788 miles each way. This would make the mileage allowed to such Delegate from Hawaii about $2,300.

DELEGATE FROM PORTO RICO.

Act of April 12, 1900, provides for a "resident commissioner" from Porto Rico to the United States, to be elected every two years by the qualified voters of Porto Rico. Salary, $5,000 per annum. No seat in Congress. No mileage allowed.

TWO RESIDENT COMMISSIONERS FROM THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Section 8 of the act of July 1, 1902, provides that the first Philippine legislature (and at each session thereafter) shall choose two resident commissioners to the United States, entitled to official recognition, and entitled to salary of $5,000 per annum each and $2,000 additional each to cover all expenses. No person eligible who is not a qualified elector of said islands, owing allegiance to the United States, and who is not 30 years of age.

DATE OF ELECTION DAY.

This bill fixes the election day in Alaska as the last Tuesday in September. All the people from Alaska with whom we have been able to consult in relation to this matter have urged us to make the election day as late in the summer or autumn as possible, leaving, of course, time enough after election day to get the returns from all voting precincts to the governor before the cold weather of winter sets in. After a good deal of discussion and investigation we finally decided that the last Tuesday in September was about the best date for election day.

There is no doubt in my mind that a larger vote would be polled if the election day could be made a month later. But we have had a good many things to consider in this connection, and the last Tuesday in September will be a satisfactory solution.

QUALIFICATIONS OF ALASKAN VOTERS.

The qualifications required of those who shall vote in Alaska for the Delegate to be elected under this bill are very few. The bill provides:

That in order to be qualified to vote for said Delegate to Congress a person shall—

First. Be a male citizen of the United States and have resided in Alaska not less than ninety days immediately preceding the election at which he offers to vote.

Second. Have attained the age of 21 years.

Third. Be able to read and write the English or some other European language.

These are the sole qualifications required of each voter. We thought it best in drawing this bill to make the election machinery very simple, and also the qualifications of the voter very few and simple. If we had in this bill attempted anything very elaborate in the line of election machinery, or a long period of residence for each elector, then we would have had a bill that would not fit the conditions in Alaska.

THE DIVISION OF ALASKA INTO VOTING PRECINCTS.

The most important provision of this bill I conceive to be the portion of the bill which provides for the division of Alaska into voting precincts. The first bill I drew provided that the three district judges of Alaska should each divide his own judicial district into voting precincts, designating the boundaries by natural objects, and issue a proclamation calling for an election on the day provided in the bill, and as a part of said proclamation give a list and description of said voting precincts.

But after consultation with others in reference to this matter we decided that it was better to leave the matter of the creation of the different voting precincts as far as possible in the hands of the people of Alaska, rather than in the hands of any single person or official.

Therefore, in this bill we provided:

First, that each incorporated town in Alaska shall constitute one voting precinct.

Second, that all territory in Alaska lying outside of any incorporated town in Alaska shall be divided into voting precincts by the people living in the territory to be divided.

The bill carries out this idea, and I think it is a very excellent one. The details of the plan are provided for in the bill.

SENDING THE RETURNS TO THE GOVERNOR.

The provisions of this bill in relation to sending the returns to the governor are, that as soon as possible after the closing of the polls and the canvassing of the votes cast the election officers shall transmit a certificate of the result, together with the ballots cast, to the governor.

The returns of the election may be sent to the governor in any manner deemed advisable. That is left to the officers of election to determine. They may be sent by special messenger if deemed advisable, but that course is not necessary under this bill. They may be transmitted by mail if thought advisable.

Now, then, it will not require any great amount of time for the returns of this election to be sent from the different portions of Alaska to the governor at Sitka.

From Eagle and Circle City the returns will reach Sitka in ten days at the farthest. From Nome the returns will reach Sitka in about six days. And these are the two points in Alaska where voting precincts will be established that are farthest from Sitka.

THE COST OF THIS ELECTION.

There is no reason for any member refraining from voting for this bill by reason of the cost to the Government of holding the election. The cost of this election, be it great or small, will have to be paid by the people of Alaska.

On this point I will state for the information of this committee that the first bill (H. R. 9865) provided that the cost of the election should be paid from Government funds in the hands of the court in Alaska; that said costs should be allowed and paid as other court expenses.

This feature of the old bill was objected to by those whose opinions have great weight in this House.

It was insisted that the expense of this election should be borne by the people in Alaska. In order to be entirely fair in my statement, however, I should say it was not the amount of the expense that was objected to, but the statement was made that the people in Alaska should early learn the lesson of the cost of an election, and that if they bore the expense that the election would be conducted in a more economical manner.

Therefore, we who had charge of drawing this bill felt that we should be obliged to provide in the bill that the expense of the election should be paid by the people in Alaska. But there is no Territorial or other form of government in Alaska, and no Territorial treasury or other public fund in that Territory out of which we could provide that said election expenses should be paid. We were between Scylla and Charybdis.

I sought counsel in this matter of the most intelligent people from Alaska that I could find in Washington City. They advised me to provide in this bill for all the necessary election machinery, and leave out of the bill any provision as to cost, they assuring me that the people of Alaska would only be too glad to pay the expense of this election in return for the benefit which they would reap in securing a Delegate on this floor.

That accounts for the absence in this bill of any provision whatever in relation to the payment of the costs of election.

Now, then, I do not wish to prolong my portion of this debate, but I will be glad to answer any questions that I am able to answer that any member of the committee may desire to ask.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman some questions in order to get the information in the RECORD.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Certainly.

Mr. WARNER. I want to ask the gentleman what is the distance, in a straight line, from the east line to the west line of Alaska?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Two thousand five hundred miles.

Mr. WARNER. And from the southern to the northern line?

Mr. CUSHMAN. One thousand miles.

Mr. WARNER. Where is the present capital of Alaska situated?

Mr. CUSHMAN. It is at Sitka.

Mr. WARNER. How far from the northern line of Alaska to Sitka, in a straight line?

Mr. CUSHMAN. About 1,000 miles.

Mr. WARNER. Is it not 2,000?

Mr. CUSHMAN. No, sir.

Mr. WARNER. How far from Sitka to the west line of the district?

Mr. CUSHMAN. It is less than 1,500 miles.

Mr. WARNER. How many square miles are estimated to be in the district of Alaska—in the whole district?

Mr. CUSHMAN. About 600,000 square miles.

Mr. WARNER. How many square miles are estimated to be in the mining districts?

Mr. CUSHMAN. The gentleman can see the districts outlined on the map here.

Mr. WARNER. Yes; but I want to get it in the RECORD.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Well, I should say perhaps not over one-sixth of the Territory of Alaska is included within the mining districts.

Mr. WARNER. Is there over one-twentieth?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Well, perhaps not.

Mr. WARNER. Now, I observe that in your amendments here you continually refer to the territory as the Territory of Alaska.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Yes.

Mr. WARNER. I suggest to the gentleman that there is no such division and that it should be changed to the "District of Alaska."

Mr. CUSHMAN. But, as I understand, the United States Supreme Court decided in 163 United States Supreme Court Reports that Alaska is a Territory.

Mr. WARNER. It is a Territory of the United States, but its designation is "District of Alaska."

Mr. CUSHMAN. In that decision, as I read it, the court decided that it was a Territory, an unorganized Territory.

Mr. WARNER. The act of Congress designates that it is, and it designates it as the district of Alaska. I simply make the suggestion. I do not care anything about it.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Very well.

Mr. SULZER. The gentleman knows that I am very much in favor of granting some relief to the people of Alaska. I would like to ask the gentleman, who is a member of the committee, and he has given a great deal of time and study to this question, why the committee did not bring in a bill to give the district of Alaska Territorial government?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Simply by reason of the fact that we realize it will be difficult enough to get even this small measure through giving them a Delegate. You can imagine, when you look upon this measure, the difficulty we had in getting even this small bill up, what our position would have been if we had come in here with a bill to give them a Territorial form of government.

Mr. SULZER. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Does he not think—he has been in Alaska, I understand—that the hundred thousand American citizens in Alaska are just as much entitled to home rule and self-government as the people in the Philippines or in Porto Rico or in the Hawaiian Islands?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Unquestionably. If I had my way to-day, I would like to see organized there a Territorial form of government. But let me suggest to the gentleman that when we get ready to frame a bill to provide a Territorial form of government for Alaska, the very first thing we shall need in the perfection of that bill will be some one on this floor who knows something about the conditions existing there to aid us in forming that bill.

Mr. SULZER. Then, Mr. Chairman, as I understand the gentleman—and I think I understand him—this bill is simply a step in the right direction—to give the Alaskans Territorial government.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Certainly.

Mr. SULZER. I should like to ask the gentleman one more question: Does he not think that his side of the House would be willing at this time to pass a bill giving the people of Alaska Territorial government, so that they should not be taxed without representation, so that they should be able to make their own laws, so that they should be able to collect their own revenue and use it for school purposes in Alaska?

Mr. BRICK. Allow me to state that no persons from Alaska have ever yet been before the committee asking for Territorial government at this time.

Mr. SULZER. In reply to what has just been said, let me remark that every newspaper in Alaska—and I have a number of them in my desk, and intend to print in the RECORD their editorials on this bill—every newspaper in Alaska asks for Territorial government. The people of Alaska are opposed to being taxed and having their revenues taken from them to be put into the United States Treasury instead of their own treasury.

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman from Washington allow me a question?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BURLESON. What proportion of the people of Alaska are citizens of the United States?

Mr. CUSHMAN. About two-thirds.

Mr. BURLESON. What proportion are Indians?

Mr. CUSHMAN. About one-third.

Mr. BURLESON. What is the proportion of foreigners?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Well, when the gentleman spoke of "citizens of the United States," I thought he meant the white population. The white population of Alaska comprises about two-thirds of the people, and the other third is composed mostly of Indians.

Mr. BURLESON. What proportion of the white population are citizens of the United States, and what proportion foreigners?

Mr. CUSHMAN. If we had here now a well-informed Delegate from Alaska, he could unquestionably answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. BURLESON. Have you been to Alaska?

Mr. CUSHMAN. I have been through the portion of it down at Wrangell, Ketchikan, Juneau, and Skagway, but not through the main portion of Alaska.

Mr. BURLESON. Then the gentleman is unable to give the information I have just asked for?

Mr. CUSHMAN. I am unable to give the gentleman that information.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Allow me an interruption. A few moments ago the gentleman was speaking of the requirements for the exercise of the elective franchise, and among other things he stated that, under the bill which, as I understand, is the one pending, No. 16653, the proposed elector must be able to read, write, and speak the English language.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Or some other European language.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, then, in the other bill the requirement is that the elector shall be able to "read and write the English language." Again, why does the gentleman add "or some other European language?"

Mr. CUSHMAN. Simply because we understand, having some knowledge of the subject, that there are some intelligent foreigners there—for instance, some Swedish or Norwegian people, or other people of that character—people educated in their own language, and to whom we ought to give the elective franchise.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why should there not be some requirement in keeping with that prescribed in Connecticut, Massachusetts, Wyoming, and other States—an educational test, something like this, that the elector shall be able to read and write the Constitution in English? Such a requirement incites a man to study the Constitution of the United States, which is not a bad thing for him to do.

Mr. CUSHMAN. The gentleman must understand that the condition existing in Alaska is different from that existing in any other locality with which I am familiar. This bill was drawn, so far as we could draw it, not to meet a theory, but to meet a condition; and we believed that such a clause as is inserted in the bill would meet the condition existing in Alaska.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman does not believe that the Constitution of the United States has not been extended to Alaska, and that copies of it can not be found there.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I hope that at this late hour my friend from Tennessee will not get started on the Constitution! [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. In view of the attitude so frequently taken by gentlemen on the other side, it is necessary now and then to remind them that there is a Constitution of the United States. Now, one other question. In the bill, which is not before the committee, the proposed elector must live in the precinct where he proposes to vote for sixty days. Now, you eliminate that provision entirely and you simply require that the man shall be for one year a resident of Alaska. Why have you stricken out the former requirement?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Simply because the population of Alaska is to some extent a moving population. For instance, in the spring they are moving from the towns out into the mining districts. In the fall they are moving from the mining districts in toward the towns. If we put an ironclad provision in this bill that a man must reside a certain length of time in the precinct, we would perhaps disfranchise a very large portion of citizens who are residents of Alaska and have every right to vote there.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. It seems to me that under the present conditions that exist in Alaska, with the eastern section about as far away from the western section as California is from Maine, in order to have a man who could give us such information as we might require in respect to Alaska, it would be a sensible thing for us to grant to Alaska three representatives instead of having but one. One could be taken from the eastern section, one from the middle, and one from the western section. What has the gentleman to say to that proposition? Is not that what we require if we are to get information about Alaska?

Mr. CUSHMAN. In a certain sense it is certainly what we require, but likewise what we could not get, in my judgment, in this House.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Why not?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Because I think a great many members would object to three Delegates on this floor representing 100,000 people.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. But they have no vote.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Certainly; they have no vote.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. And they could give us the information.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I am perfectly willing that a provision of this kind should be incorporated into the bill.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. And I think the gentleman will have to do it if he wants to have a bill which will be of any use here.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I do not wholly agree with the gentleman there. It would be a very useful provision, unquestionably.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. We have to-day a governor from Sitka. He knows no more about the country and its changes or about the country above there than the gentleman does, or I do. He will get his information from the newspapers, and if we are to have a man who can bring direct information to this House, we shall have to have a man who lives round a particular section, one along the eastern section, one up around the Nome country, and one about the western section, and those are the three developing spots of Alaska.

Mr. CUSHMAN. While there is some force in what the gentleman says, let me remind him that the men who reside in Alaska travel all over that Territory. Nearly every man in there has been from Eagle City down the Yukon River to Nome and back down the coast. You will find a man in Skagway to-day, at the head of the Yukon River next week, and perhaps at Nome the month after.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. But will those men know the present conditions or the existing conditions which require legislative action? They certainly will not.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Some of them will and some of them will not. They are just like other citizens who travel over the country—some of them never see anything except the inside of a railway coach and others learn something about the country through which they travel.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Still, a man who is a resident of a particular place knows about the country round about and understands the conditions of the place where he resides, providing he is not a floater.

Mr. CUSHMAN. But does not the gentleman conceive that the men to whose judgment it is left to select this Delegate are going to select a man who has some general information about the entire Territory?

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. That is the trouble. They can not possibly select a man. It is not in the nature of things to select a man who will be able to give this information unless we have a man who represents these different places, so far apart, so almost inaccessible, and I think it will be a very valuable thing, indeed a necessity, for Alaska to have three representatives instead of one.

Mr. HAMILTON. It would be the business of the Delegate to inform himself.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. He could not possibly inform himself.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY].

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I only want to take the time of the committee for a few minutes to call attention to one feature of this bill. The most difficult problem that those framing the bill had to contend with was to provide the local machinery with which to hold the election. Finally it was determined to select the organized towns and cities as one of the classes of election precincts. That left the other territory outside.

In order to provide for the voters outside of the towns it was proposed to allow each mining district, which is something analogous to the New England town meeting, to organize and select the election officers and specify the points at which the elections were to be held. This plan enabled the parties drawing the bill to avoid the original proposition of having the elections held under the direction of the courts, leaving the matter with the people themselves. And in view of the general proceedings in miners' meetings, and the intelligence with which those meetings exercise the rights that have been given to them by the mining laws, I believe there will be no difficulty on their part in organizing the local election machinery. The miners' meeting is the political unit in organizing such a Territory. That seemed to be the most difficult problem involved in the drawing of this bill, and I only wish to take the time of the committee long enough to call their attention to this proposed solution, which I believe to be entirely adequate to the situation there. If we have a Delegate from Alaska, that Delegate can aid in the framing of the future bill for a Territorial government, which must come sooner or later.

Alaska has great possibilities and her future may be greatly directed by an intelligent representation in this House.

She has had some serious difficulties arising from the appointment of bad men to office. A representative here, chosen by the people and representing the people, would be of much assistance in protecting them from such impositions in the future.

Under the proposed bill there will be no serious difficulty in holding an election, and the legislation for the Territory can then be framed with his assistance.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD].

The CHAIRMAN. How much time?

Mr. LLOYD. I have an hour in my own right and I will use so much as is necessary.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition in my own right.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Washington to reserve his time so that the gentleman from Missouri can be recognized in his own time?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Yes; as a member of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman from Missouri in opposition to the bill?

Mr. LLOYD. No; but I am a member of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is anyone who desires to be heard in opposition to the bill he is entitled to be recognized first.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. There is nobody on the committee opposed to the bill, is there?

Mr. LLOYD. There is nobody on the committee opposed to the bill. I ask to be recognized as a member of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is entitled to be recognized now if no one desires to be recognized in opposition to the bill.

Mr. LLOYD. That is all right.

The CHAIRMAN. If anyone desires to be heard in opposition to the bill he is entitled to be recognized first. The gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. LLOYD. I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WOOTEN] such time as he desires.

[Mr. WOOTEN addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. WOOTEN. I now yield, Mr. Chairman, the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WOOTEN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, I ask permission, having spoken rapidly and impromptu, to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if he intends to go on further with the debate to-night?

Mr. CUSHMAN. I should like to take a vote to-night. I see no reason why we can not have a vote. I do not think that anybody here is opposed to the bill.

Mr. LLOYD. I think it would be well for the committee to rise. Does my friend from Illinois wish to be heard?

Mr. CANNON. I should like to be heard.

Mr. LLOYD. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] wishes to be heard, and it will take a half hour to read the bill.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I will state to the gentleman that my understanding is that to-morrow there is a special order for pension business, a privileged order, which will perhaps shut us out. Unless we get a vote to-night the bill will go over.

Mr. LLOYD. The bill can go over until Saturday if we do not finish it now. I think we can avoid any trouble about debate, however, and I will yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER].

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I substantially concur with all that the gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN] has so well, and so ably, and so eloquently said regarding Alaska, and the needs of that vast domain for immediate legislation, looking toward home rule and self-government.

The bill now under consideration for a Delegate, however, in my opinion, does not go far enough. It will not meet the just demands of the people of Alaska, and I fear very much that it will not give satisfaction to, or meet the expectations of, the inhabitants of that vast territory. At the same time I do not fail to realize that this bill is a step in the right direction, that it will accomplish something, and I shall vote for it for that reason, indulging the hope that the time is not far distant when the Congress must give Alaska what Alaska wants—Territorial government. That is, sir, what the people up there want, and that is what they ought to have. It is right, and it is American. Alaska is just as much entitled to Territorial government to-day as Arizona or New Mexico. If we follow the precedents of the past we can not withhold this boon from the people of Alaska. They are fairly entitled to it.

In the light of all precedents and the experience of the past their population warrants it. For the benefit of those who know not, I insert a table which shows the population of 12 different States and Territories about the time they were given representation. Many of them had a representative for some time before the enumeration had been made which brought forth these figures. Probably at the time of their receiving Delegate privileges this population did not average 3,000 whites in each Territory, and they had very little but agricultural matters to look after, with no comparison in commercial affairs to Alaska to-day.

In 1890 the census of Alaska showed a population of 32,052. The census report for 1900 gives the population of Alaska as 63,592. When we consider the vast difficulty attendant upon the full and correct enumeration of population in thickly settled and more accessible districts, and how frequently the statement is made even in large cities that the census enumerators failed to properly enumerate and return a considerable per cent of the population, then how much more likely is it that in a district like Alaska, a vast expanse of territory with widely scattered towns, settlements, and mining camps, isolated and separated, without railroad and telegraphic communications—how much more likely is it, I say, that where conditions like these exist that the census enumeration has not been full and complete.

I submit, in view of the foregoing, that it is not an extravagant estimate to place the present population of the Territory of Alaska at 100,000 people, and this population will undoubtedly increase in a greater ratio during the next few years than it has in the past.

The number of white people were less than 5,000 in 1890, with a very large portion of the remainder Indians and mixed. This great increase during the last ten years has not been caused by the births of natives. The Indian is rapidly passing away, so that the majority of the present population of 63,592 are beyond question whites who have emigrated from the States. These persons dominate the Territory, and in a short time, through the evolution of nature, the native Indian will have become a tradition.

Now, Mr. Chairman, by way of comparison, let me cite you a few cases. In the record of Territorial organizations we find that Nebraska, embracing all the district of country lying between the Missouri River and the Rocky Mountains and extending from the 40th degree of latitude to the boundary line between the United States and Canada, was made a Territory in 1854, with a population too insignificant to be mentioned in the report of the preceding census, if, indeed, it were ascertainable. Yet we find that six years later it had attained a population of only 28,841—less than half that of Alaska in 1900. The Territory of Dakota, embracing what are now the States of North and South Dakota, was organized in 1861, having for two years previous maintained a provisional government of her own, although she was credited by the census of 1860 with a population of only 4,837, which, owing to the unsettled state of the country induced by the great civil war during that decade, increased to the extent of only 9,544 in the next succeeding ten years.

The capital was established at Yankton, in the entreme southeastern end of what is now the State of South Dakota, distant from the most remote settlements little, if any, less than 700 miles. There were no railroads or wagon roads, and the means of communication, except between Missouri River points, were not only more primitive than is now the case in Alaska, but at the same time far more expensive and dangerous. The country was a vast wilderness of treeless prairie, arid plains, and "bad lands," which, but for the building of subsidized railroads in advance of settlement, would never have become the home of any considerable number of white men. It was not then known to possess any of the great natural resources of which Alaska can now truthfully boast, and had the little handful of hardy pioneers who set up a government of their own in advance of Territorial organization been subjected to the operation of a policy similar to that which long ago obtained in the government of Alaska, and is still in vogue, it is not improbable that what are now two great and prosperous States of the Union would have remained to this day, figuratively speaking, a wilderness.

And so, sir, with many, if not all, of the Territories when they were first organized. The facts and the figures conclusively prove that Alaska is more entitled now to Territorial government than any of the Territories organized in the years gone by west of the Mississippi River. Why should we deprive the citizens of Alaska of Territorial government? Is there a man here that can give any answer, except the logical answer that Alaska should become a Territory with all the rights of a Territory?

Mr. Chairman, the district of Alaska is a vast domain lying in the extreme northwestern corner of the North American continent, on Bering Sea and the North Pacific. It comprises an area of about 577,390 statute square miles, with a seacoast of 26,000 miles, or nearly two and one-half times the seacoast of the balance of the United States. The district was acquired by purchase by the United States from Russia for $7,200,000, and the boundaries as laid down in the treaty of cession of March 30, 1867, are: "Commencing from the southernmost point of the island called 'Prince of Wales Island,' which point lies in the parallel of 54° 40′ north latitude, and between the one hundred and thirty-first and one hundred and thirty-third degrees of west longitude (meridian of Greenwich), the said line shall ascend to the north along the channel called Portland Canal as far as the point of the continent where it strikes the fifty-sixth degree of north latitude; from this last-mentioned point the line of demarcation shall follow the summit of the mountains situated parallel to the coast as far as the point of intersection of the one hundred and forty-first degree of west longitude (of the same meridian), and finally from the said point of intersection the said meridian line of the one hundred and forty-first degree in its prolongation as far as the frozen ocean. With reference to the line of demarcation laid down in the preceding article it is understood, first, that the island called 'Prince of Wales Island' shall belong wholly to Russia (now, by cession, to the United States); second, that whenever the summit of the mountains which extend in a direction parallel to the coast from the fifty-sixth degree of north latitude to the point of intersection of the one hundred and forty-first degree of west longitude shall prove to be at the distance of more than 10 marine leagues from the ocean, the limit between the British possessions and the line of coast which is to belong to Russia as above mentioned (that is to say, the limit of the possessions ceded by this convention) shall be formed by a line parallel to the winding of the coast, and which shall never exceed the distance of 10 marine leagues therefrom. The western limits, within which the territories and dominion conveyed are contained, passes through a point in Bering Straits on the parallel of 65 degrees 30 minutes north latitude, and its intersection by the meridian which passes midway between the island of Krusenstern, or Ignalook, and the island of Ratmanoff, or Noonarbook, and proceeds due north, without limitation, into the same frozen ocean. The same western limitation, beginning at the same initial point, proceeds thence in a course nearly southwest through Bering Straits and Bering Sea, so as to pass midway between the northwest point of the island of St. Lawrence and the southeast point of Cape Choukotski, to the meridian of 172 west longitute; thence from the intersection of that meridian, in a southwesterly direction, so as to pass midway between the island of Attou and the Copper Island of the Kormandorski couplet or group in the North Pacific Ocean, to the meridian of 193 degrees west longitude, so as to include in the territory conveyed the whole of the Aleutian Islands east of the meridian."

This is the vast domain of land ceded to the United States from Russia by the treaty in 1867, and the American people will never consent to give up an inch of it to Canada or any other country. It is ours and it must always be ours. We can not arbitrate our sovereignty, and we will never surrender our jurisdiction.

When this country in 1867 paid Russia $7,200,000 in gold coin for the Territory of Alaska, a great outcry arose over the shameful extravagance of the Government. We had purchased, it was alleged by these fault-finders, a barren waste of snow and ice, an arctic region incapable of cultivation, whose only treasure was the seals that might be killed along its coast. The Administration had squandered the money of the people, and shrewd Russia was laughing in her sleeve over our simplicity!

It is possible that Russia did laugh in her sleeve over the simplicity that she imagined she had discovered, but it is certain that by this time she has changed her laugh to a sigh over the results of her own shortsightedness, for Alaska is recognized to-day as one of the most important gold-producing lands in the world. Her mines are the mecca of armies of prospectors, who go there to search for the precious ore that is the foundation of the money systems of the commercial world. She has returned to us in gold ore alone more than we paid Russia for her possession, and the sources of her golden treasure have as yet scarcely been scratched.

But it is not only in mineral wealth that Alaska promises to be a valuable territory. That claim alone would be ample justification for the purchase of the arctic land, but she has other claims to add to this. Had anybody predicted, when the negotiation for her sale was conducted, that she could ever assume to be an agricultural country, he would have been regarded as a fit subject for treatment in a lunatic asylum. But we are progressing in knowledge. The Agricultural Department has been investigating, and it now announces that certain crops can be raised in Alaska at a good profit, and that great herds of cattle will thrive in her friendly climate.

Thus the purchase of Alaska promises to be one of the wisest things ever accomplished by our Government.

The great speech of Charles Sumner, delivered in the United States Senate in favor of the purchase of Alaska, in the light of to-day reads like a marvelous prophecy. Alaska ceased years ago to be called "Seward's folly." No amount of money could buy it from us to-day, and ultimately it will make three great States of the Union—and no doubt they will be called "Alaska," "Seward," and "Sumner." What a monument Alaska is to-day to the wisdom and far-sighted statesmanship of Charles Sumner and William H. Seward!

Mr. Chairman, another reason for a Delegate, which must impress itself with great force upon every member, is the fact that most of the relations with the Territory are direct with the General Government.

The Committee on the Territories, to whom was referred this bill providing for the election of a Delegate from the district of Alaska to the House of Representatives of the United States, defining citizenship and the qualifications of electors in said district, have had the same under consideration, and, without a dissenting voice, report unanimously that it do pass.

A bill of similar purpose was reported from the Committee on the Territories of the House of Representatives in the Fifty-third Congress near its close, too late for action, and another in the Fifty-fourth Congress, which for some reason failed to become a law. A third time, in the second session of the Fifty-sixth Congress, a similar bill was introduced and unanimously reported by the Committee on the Territories to the House, but the bill, on account of the press of business during the close of that session, failed of consideration in the House.

In my opinion, fortified by the judgment of the great majority of the population of the Territory of Alaska, whose best men have not only recommended it, but have urged it as an absolute necessity at this time, I submit that the Congress should no longer delay the right of these people to Delegate representation.

It is a tenet of our American creed that proper elective representation is the heritage of our citizenship. Whatever may have been the needs and the requirements of the limitations of Alaska in the past, I think the time has now arrived when it is not only feasible for its inhabitants to elect and have Delegate representation in the House of Representatives, but that its absolute necessity makes it a matter of right which we should heed by speedy action.

Alaska is a Territory whose prospects, resources, and commercial and political importance have heretofore been almost wholly unappreciated by most people. Even now, in the period of Alaska's marvelous development, the first thought of many persons is that a Delegate would be a doubtful experiment and an unnecessary expense, when, in fact, of all our outlying Territories, Alaska is the one whose needs in this respect are paramount. Its isolation, distance, and peculiar surroundings as to climate, soil, resources, business and trade conditions, as well as population, render it impossible for Congress to fully recognize its wants and exigencies.

Alaska has an area of over 577,000 square miles. It would cover one-sixth of the territory of the United States proper. Its resources are simply wonderful; with its mines of gold, silver, copper, and coal, its mighty forests of merchantable timber, its rich wealth of fur-bearing animals, its enormous fisheries of seal, whale, salmon, cod, and halibut, and its already great and commanding commercial and political importance. And then, in connection with all this, comes the voice of a resistless and increasing flow of the most manly, virile, and hardy people in the world, who say, "Give us the protection of an interested and sympathetic Government and we will not only support ourselves, but we will return direct into the United States Treasury revenues many times multiplying the amount of her investment by purchase."

At this point the expense of an election and the salary of a Delegate might well be considered. This country is a large territory of the primeval ruggedness of nature, unmitigated in part with long stretches of snow and ice and a scattered population. There may be inconveniences in an election on the frontier to which we are not accustomed, but that is the daily incident of their lives. Tenacity of purpose and power of endurance are the two essential qualities that took them there. They have great interests to be looked after, and they say, "We want a man at Washington who knows us, our country, and our business to represent us and our interests."

It will be of some inconvenience and expense, but they are asking the privilege to incur whatever inconvenience it may be to hold an election. After that the only question for us to consider is: Is it reasonable and practicable? Those who seem to be most competent to judge say it is. As to the expense, they pay it. That is all there is to that. While discussing this phase of the subject I desire to insert a statement from the Treasury Department showing the revenues and expenditures of the government of Alaska for the fiscal year 1900. This shows a balance in favor of the Treasury in the splendid figures of $282,950, out of which to pay the expense of an election every two years.

But, aside from the question of expense, why should they not have a Delegate at this time? In the first place there is a large and ever-increasing body of the best kind of American citizens in Alaska—pioneers who are willing to forego the ease and luxury of life in the States to develop that great country. The best blood of a nation flows in the veins of its pioneers. They are the advance guard of progress. They have opened up in Alaska a mine of wealth that the world never dreamed of. They have made Alaska commercially great, and for a decade have felt the need and practicability of a Delegate, and have been asking it from our hands for years. To-day, with a population doubled since the last census was taken and material financial interests increased in a still greater ratio, they ask you for this legislation.

The bill under consideration gives the people of Alaska the right to vote for and to elect a Delegate from Alaska to the House of Representatives who shall have the same rights and the same privileges in this body as a Delegate from any of the other Territories in the United States. Alaska is entitled to that. No one can deny it. Her people should be heard on this floor, and the Alaskans want to be heard here by some one of their own selection—competent to speak for them. Some one vested with authority who will be responsible to them for what he says on the floor of this House regarding Alaskan matters, and who will be responsible to Congress as well. No one familiar with the facts can doubt that Alaska is entitled to Delegate representation. It is a fundamental principle of our theory of government that none of our citizens shall be taxed without just representation, and the Alaskans have been taxed by the Federal Government for years and years without representation and without having a voice in their own internal affairs.

Mr. Chairman, I have been to Alaska several times. I know something about that vast domain. I know something about the sentiments of the people who live there, and I stand here and declare with the confident knowledge that I can not be successfully contradicted that the people of Alaska—the people who have gone there, and who have lived there for years, and who are bona fide residents of Alaska, and intend to stay there during the rest of their lives—I know what they want, and I declare here that they want not only a representative in Congress, but they want Territorial government. They want the right that every other Territory in the Union has—the right to make their own laws, to levy their own taxes, to regulate their own internal affairs, and to spend the money gathered by the tax collector for their own use, for their own schools, for their own charitable institutions, for their own municipal affairs, and for their own peace and happiness. This is not asking too much in my opinion. It seems to me it is only fair and just and proper and right. Alaska has a population at the present time upward of 100,000 bona fide residents. It is true they are scattered over a vast domain of territory. But it is also true that they are an honest, brave, sober, manly, God-fearing people, who are of our kin, and who ought to be treated as American citizens.

I deprecate some of the remarks that have been made on the floor of this House during the pendency of this bill by gentlemen who have characterized the inhabitants of Alaska as nomads, as fugitives, and as a migratory people who go there simply to gather wealth and leave for the States just so soon as they have been able to get what they want. I deny these statements. I refute these allegations. I know they are not true. If some of the gentlemen who have made these unjust remarks and uncalled-for statements would only go to Alaska and see for themselves and talk to these people, they would come back here just as firmly convinced as I am that no people in all our land are more deserving of commendation for their patriotism and their law-abiding citizenship than the good, fearless, honest folk of Alaska. They are American citizens. They demand the rights of American citizens. They are entitled to all the rights of American citizens, and one of the fundamental rights of an American is the right to representation; the right to refuse to pay a dollar's tax to the Government unless he has a voice in its affairs; the right of local self-government; the right of petition; the right of assembly; the right to have a voice in the affairs of state and in making the laws that he must obey and that govern him and his fellow-citizens.

This bill, sir, will not accomplish what the Alaskans demand; but, as I said, it is a step in the right direction, and I shall vote for it because I believe it is the best we can get at the present time. I hope, however, when this bill passes the House and comes before the Senate, that the other branch of Congress will enlarge the scope of its provisions and, if possible, report a substitute for it that will give the people of Alaska what they most devoutly desire, and that is Territorial government. They demand Territorial government, and knowing the facts as I do, I unhesitatingly say, and I defy successful refutation, that under all the circumstances Alaska is now, and long has been, entitled to Territorial government, and Congress ought to give it to the Alaskans without any more delay. Alaska is an anomaly in our sisterhood of States and Territories. It has been said here that Alaska is a Territory because a justice of the United States Supreme Court, writing an opinion about it, characterized it as such. No doubt it is a part of the territory of the United States, and perhaps that is what the distinguished jurist meant. Others here declare that Alaska is only a district, and I am inclined to concur in that view. If Alaska was a Territory in the Union, it would have all the rights of a Territory. It is not a Territory in the sense that Arizona, New Mexico, and Oklahoma are Territories. It ought to be a Territory of our Government just the same as those other Territories and have all the rights and all the privileges that those Territories possess to-day; and the Alaskans will never be satisfied—never be contented—in my opinion, with any law that does not give them all the rights those other Territories possess.

A Delegate from an unorganized Territory would be not only a departure from all former precedent, but in the case of Alaska might be much more productive of evil than of beneficial results. In the absence of any form of local government, it may be impossible for a Delegate to properly represent the will and the wishes of the people, because of a lack of knowledge in the premises. I know that the people of Alaska are, in every point of view, abundantly capable of maintaining a local form of government, such as has always heretofore been accorded the Territories of the United States, and I deprecate the idea of further burdening the Congress with purely local legislation, as would, presumably, be the duty of a Delegate to press upon the attention of this body in the absence of Territorial organization. In my opinion, such legislation can safely be intrusted to the people of Alaska themselves, and in my judgment, instead of the bill providing a Delegate for the unorganized Territory, or district, of Alaska, an organic act should be passed, according to her people the measure of self-government to which they are justly entitled, and which has never heretofore, except in the case of Alaska, been withheld from any considerable body of American citizens engaged in the settlement of a new district.

Looking at the question in the light of the past, and by way of comparison with other portions of our country that have been made Territories in our Union, I believe that Alaska is more entitled to-day to Territorial government than seven-tenths of the other Territories that were organized. I am opposed, as a matter of right, and of justice, and of principle, to taxing the Alaskan people, gathering the taxes by a Federal tax collector, and, instead of giving the taxes to the people of Alaska for their own local purposes, depositing the money in the Federal Treasury and trying to govern Alaska from the Treasury Department or by the Congress, when nine-tenths of the men in Congress know absolutely nothing about the people up there, nor the country, either. But that is another story that will come up ere long, when we legislate to give Alaska Territorial government.

Mr. Chairman, something has been said here regarding the impossibility of holding an election in Alaska under this bill, should it become a law, and that its provisions would open the door to frauds on the ballot box. In my opinion, that conclusion is assumed, farfetched, and without justification. If this bill should become a law in its present state, the election of a Delegate in Congress from Alaska would be just as honestly conducted as the election for a Representative in Congress in any State. And the Delegate elected would be, no doubt, in the estimation of the Alaskans, or in the estimation of a mjority of them, the most competent man they could find to send here to represent them, to get their rights, and to give Congress the information desired regarding legislation.

Let me say here, Mr. Chairman, that I appreciate all that the gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN] has done in getting this bill reported and before the House. I understand the difficulties he had to contend with. I am familiar with the obstacles which were put in his way. I know he has done the very best he could. He and I substantially agree regarding the immediate legislative needs of Alaska, but everything relating to Alaska can not be accomplished in one Congress. This bill is a step in the right direction—a forward step toward Territorial government—and it is apparently the very best that we can do for the Alaskans at the present time. I want to congratulate the gentleman from Washington and the members of the committee which reported this bill on the success which thus far has crowned their efforts, and in the hope that this bill will accomplish some good I shall vote for it, and I trust it will pass by an overwhelming majority.

Mr. Chairman, I have spoken of Alaskan resources in general terms as a reason for her recognition. Her mines of gold, silver, coal, and copper, already known to be great, are considered by many practically inexhaustible. She has the largest stamp mill in the world at Treadwell and bids fair to become the greatest gold-producing country on earth. The rapid development of the gold and silver mining industry of Alaska during the past four years is shown by the fact that the production has advanced from about $3,000,000 in 1896 to about $7,000,000 in 1900. This will increase, rather than diminish. At present the value of the precious metals lies chiefly in the gold placers of Nome and the interior regions. In the Nome region some 5,000 square miles are known to carry auriferous gravels, while in the Yukon Basin the area of auriferous gravels is probably several times as large. But it is not all placer mining. Governor Brady says that quartz mining is the kind in which Alaska will be preeminent in the near future and that even now it is affording the finest illustration that the world knows of profitable working of low-grade ore.

In the coast region of southeastern Alaska mining for gold, copper, and silver has been going on for a number of years. The development of this industry has been especially rapid since 1898, and it promises to become one of the most important mining districts of the country. The discovery of copper deposits in Alaska was made only three years ago, and hence the development is comparatively insignificant, though there are three districts in which valuable copper ores have been found. Mining has only been done in the one lying on the coast, and many tons of copper ore have been shipped from the Territory. The investigations of the past two years have shown, however, that there are unquestionably vast undeveloped copper deposits in at least three districts of Alaska. The coal of Alaska embraces lignites, bituminous coal, and some anthracite. The lignites are the most widely distributed of the three, and are the ones that have been largely prospected. Coal has been found in nearly every part of the District, both on the coast and in the interior. It has been mined at probably 100 different localities, but up to the present time only for local consumption, and the aggregate output, of which there are no authentic data available, would not amount to more than a few thousand tons a year. The coal is so widely distributed in the district that it must be regarded as one of its most important resources. It is a conservative estimate to place the area occupied by the coal-bearing rocks at 100,000 square miles. Accurate statements can not be made as to the figures of the fish industry for the year 1900, but it can be said that it has been continually growing and is still in its infancy. More than one hundred varieties of food fish inhabit the Alaskan waters. The annual output of salmon alone will amount to more than $9,000,000 at this time. The Territory alone can feed the fish-eating world.

Mr. Chairman, no man can visit Alaska without being deeply impressed. Alaska is a wonderful country. No words can adequately describe it. It is the poor man's, and the rich man's, and the sportsman's paradise. It is a wonderland. The time, in my judgment, is at hand when this vast territory will be developed by American genius, American capital, and American enterprise, and take my word for it, there will be no more prosperous section in all this progressive land for American brawn and American brain. Alaska is the place for the new settler—for the hustler—for the man who wants to go ahead and get on.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, let me say again in conclusion, I shall vote for this bill, but in doing so I think I have made it clear that the bill does not go far enough, that it is only a step forward in the right direction to the one boon the good people in Alaska demand, and that is Territorial government. Alaska wants this; Alaska must have it; Alaska with her population of nearly 100,000 people; Alaska with her splendid and invigorating climate; Alaska with her beautiful scenery, her magnificent distances, her towering snow-capped mountains, her majestic rivers, her fertile fields, her great industries of fish and furs and timber and agricultural possibilities; Alaska with her immense wealth in gold and copper and silver and lead and iron and coal—mineral wealth beyond the dreams of the most imaginative person in the world; Alaska with her brave and loyal and God-fearing and patriotic American citizens; Alaska with her churches and schools, her splendid institutions, her towns and villages; Alaska under the blue dome of the Union sky and in the shadow of the midnight sun; Alaska with her incomparable glaciers, with her great harbors and innumerable lakes and countless cascades; Alaska, in the name of of all these and more, in the name of this generation and the glory of our institutions, I ask why you should not have the right of home rule, of local self-government, and all the rights of the Territories? [Applause.]

Mr. LLOYD. I reserve the rest of my time.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CUSHMAN. I should like, if possible, to secure a vote on this bill to-night, though if it be the judgment of the Committee of the Whole that the committee ought to rise now, I do not wish to act in an unseemly way about a matter of that kind. I should like, however, to have a vote.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to be heard only a few moments. While I think that Alaska should have some one on this floor to present its interests and tell us from time to time what he knows about the district, I am opposed to this bill and the methods by which it is being pressed. I know that Alaska is a great country. I have visited the fringe of it several times and have been impressed with its resources. I would not detract in the least from the high standing of Charles Sumner or William H. Seward as statesmen, but I do think they are not entitled to any great credit for acquiring Alaska.

They did not enter upon the matter as a business proposition; they did not urge the purchase of this Territory because it was a good bargain for the United States. It was purchased and paid for to cover the expenses of the Russian fleet in American waters in 1863. When England threatened to raise our blockade of the Southern ports and end the interstate war, Russia, which was friendly to the United States, sent her entire available fleet over to American waters and told Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Seward that that fleet was subject to their orders.

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. WARNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SULZER. Does the gentleman mean to imply that Secretary Seward and Senator Sumner purchased Alaska as a bribe to Russia?

Mr. WARNER. No, sir; I do not intend to imply anything of the kind. They were paying an honest debt. This Government owed Russia for the expenses of that fleet in 1863. That fleet was sent over to American waters, and remained the entire winter at the expense of Russia. When the war was over, and it was not deemed wise to let the whole world know what that secret understanding was, the United States wanted to pay the expenses of maintaining that fleet here during that winter; and those expenses were paid under cover of the purchase of Alaska, which, at that time, was not considered by anybody to be worth 10 cents in the current money of the country.

Mr. PAYNE. Did not Charles Sumner, in his great speech in the Senate upon the ratification of the treaty of purchase, describe in detail the resources of Alaska as completely, as thoroughly, and as truthfully as the gentleman from Illinois or any other gentleman can do it to-day?

Mr. WARNER. I presume that whatever Mr. Sumner said was better said than I could say it.

Mr. PAYNE. That is not the question.

Mr. WARNER. But Charles Sumner was opposed to the purchase of the district of Alaska until he was convinced by Mr. Seward and Mr. Lincoln that it was desirable to complete that transaction and to find some excuse for it.

Mr. SULZER. Was not that during the Administration of Andrew Johnson?

Mr. LACEY. Is it not true that Mr. Seward himself claimed that his reputation as a statesman depended more upon the Alaskan purchase than upon any other act in his life?

Mr. WARNER. I do not know whether he did or not. I would not take one bit of credit away from Mr. Seward or anyone else, but I do say at the time that purchase was made no one of the gentlemen in the Senate considered it a very good financial transaction as a purchase and a purchase alone; but that is immaterial. Let us get down to this bill. I think that Alaska should have representation on this floor, but I say it is unwise to obtain that representation by the methods prescribed in this bill.

The bill does not provide for a representation of the people of Alaska. It provides only that mining districts and incorporated towns shall be represented on this floor, and the gentleman in charge of the bill, when I asked how much of that Territory was covered by these mining districts, said about one-sixth.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. WARNER. Yes.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Does the gentleman refer now to the Territory or to the population?

Mr. WARNER. I am referring to the Territory—the district. I presume there are people all over it.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Not by any manner of means.

Mr. WARNER. Then draw your lines and say where the representation shall go, and how far.

Mr. CUSHMAN. The lines are drawn and show where the population is.

Mr. WARNER. The bill provides that each mining district shall be an election district.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Yes.

Mr. WARNER. It provides that every person living outside of that mining district shall vote at that district, no matter how far away he may be.

Mr. CUSHMAN. In the nearest precinct next to the place where he resides.

Mr. WARNER. And the gentleman will make some of them go over a thousand miles to vote or not vote at all. Those mining districts are where they find the minerals. I asked the gentleman if one-twentieth was not nearer than one-sixth of the territory of Alaska covered by the mining districts, and he did not answer me, or if he did I did not hear him.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. WARNER. Yes.

Mr. CUSHMAN. The situation is this: Wherever there is any population in Alaska a mining district has been created. Wherever the population is, there a mining district has been created. Now, then, there is no agricultural population in this country.

Mr. WARNER. "A house divided against itself can not stand." One of the gentleman's committee says Alaska is one of the greatest agricultural countries in the world.

Mr. CUSHMAN. It has wonderful agricultural possibilities, but of the 3,500,000 acres in that Territory there are but 2,000 acres which have been surveyed. That is one of the troubles that we have had here. There was nobody here to present that condition to us. The land has not been surveyed there. Nobody can get a homestead. The agricultural possibilities are there and the agricultural population will be there when they have an opportunity to get a homestead.

Mr. WARNER. I do not know of any country in the world where a man can get a homestead so easily or so large as in Alaska. If any one of you will go up into that fine agricultural country that Jorgensen from his heights in Sitka talks about, you can locate a homestead of 5,000 acres, if you want to, and you will not be disturbed for many years, I will undertake to say. There are other people besides the miners in Alaska, according to the statements on this floor.

There are fishermen; more, perhaps, than there are miners. It is an immense agricultural country. What I object to is the method of appointing this Delegate. The bill provides that there shall be election districts, and, according to the report accompanying the bill, it would require 150 different polling places. There are 577,000 square miles of territory in that district, according to the report. Each election district would have to be made 88 miles long by 62 miles wide in order to cover the whole country.

According to this bill you must advertise an election as thoroughly as it "may be." What would it cost to publish the notices of the elections that are to be held for the selection of the Delegates, and remember that this is the only election that will be held in Alaska except for municipal officers in incorporated cities? The only officer to be elected in Alaska, if this law is passed, is this Delegate. He is to be elected by a population which amounts to 63,000 people in summer time and about 15,000, perhaps, in winter time. The census of 1900 was taken in the summer time and there were 63,000 persons, all told, in Alaska at that time.

I will venture the statement that on the 1st day of the following December there were not 30,000 people in Alaska. They do not go up there for permanent residence. They go to make money, in the fierce race for wealth. These mining districts, the only ones that are recognized in this bill, are filled up and populated by miners alone, who go there, not for the purpose of locating or going into the country and living there and raising families, but for the purpose of getting gold and getting back to the States. And yet this bill recognizes no other class of people. According to this bill, the election must be held on the last Tuesday of September of each year, as I remember.

Mr. CUSHMAN. The last Tuesday in September.

Mr. WARNER. The returns must be in the hands of the governor before the 10th day of the following November. He has no jurisdiction to pay any attention to those that come in after that time. The average distance that will have to be traveled from the polling places, if fixed according to this bill, would be 1,000 miles as the crow flies, and to make that trip in the forty-five days that are allowed from the election to the time the returns must be in the hands of the governor a man would have to make 22½ miles a day in an air line.

In that country that would mean 45 miles a day by the routes that would have to be traveled, and it can not be made with the kind of conveyances they have up there. Forty-five miles a day each way for the messenger going down and back would require at least ninety days' travel. You would have to pay that man $5 a day for his trip for his time. Each messenger in carrying these returns to the governor would be entitled to four or five hundred dollars, and then he would not get big pay. There would be 150 of these messengers. There would be at least 150 election precincts and polling places. There are 5 officers to each one of these. Those officers would be allowed $5 a day according to this bill.

Mr. CUSHMAN. What is that statement?

Mr. WARNER. Five dollars a day.

Mr. CUSHMAN. They are not allowed anything.

Mr. WARNER. Then your report is wrong.

Mr. CUSHMAN. That report was drawn on the old bill. Objection was made to the old bill, and one of the objections that was made was to this provision.

Mr. WARNER. Well, then, we will knock down the barrier and we will have to pay them $10 a day. Miners who are getting out nuggets and the immense wealth you are talking about are not going to work for $5 a day if they are allowed their own price.

Mr. CUSHMAN. There is nothing in the bill that provides for a single penny being paid by the Government of the United States. Whatever the expense is, they pay it.

Mr. WARNER. Where is it provided that they be paid anything?

Mr. CUSHMAN. There is not anything provided in the bill.

Mr. WARNER. Then you will not have any election.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I will say to the gentleman that in the first bill we had a provision that the expenses should be paid by the Government, and objection was made to that from a very authoritative source in this House. In response to that we struck that out and submitted the only proposition that we could put in.

They have no treasury up there. We could not put in this bill a provision that the expenses should be paid from the Territorial treasury, because they have no Territorial treasury. We have collected $400,000 of their money, however, and turned it into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. WARNER. If I were certain that your bill would stand as it is, I would be willing to let it go through, because it would not amount to anything. If you do not provide pay for anyone, nothing will be done. But I suppose you will come in for an appropriation later, and therefore I will go into the question as to how much it will cost for the holding of an election and getting the returns down to the governor.

The pay of the messengers who would have to travel night and day in order to get there in time; the salary of the Delegate, his mileage, his clerk hire, his stationery; those things alone would amount to $30,000 a year; not every two years, but they would amount to $30,000 a year, and I can give you the figures if you want them. That does not include anything to pay the cost of advertising, printing, stationery, rent of voting places, etc.

Mr. LLOYD. I should like to see those figures which the gentleman has.

Mr. WARNER. I will give you some of them right here.

A MEMBER. Give us all of them.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman want to give a Delegate to Alaska at any time in the future?

Mr. WARNER. Yes; I do.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will it not cost $30,000 a year then?

Mr. WARNER. No; it will cost $5,000 a year, the mileage, the clerk hire, and the stationery; that is all.

Mr. CUSHMAN. That is all this bill does.

Mr. LLOYD. That is all this bill does.

Mr. WARNER. You are trying to sneak a bill through, then, under the impression that it will cost nothing, and later you will come in for an appropriation to pay the expenses of the election. If you will say you will never ask an appropriation to pay the expenses of conducting the election or taking the returns down to the governor, I will favor your bill, if you will put it in black and white and stick to it. [Laughter.]

The trouble is it is simply a wedge to get your fingers in and then the Treasury is wide open.

Mr. CUSHMAN. That is the Illinois method.

Mr. WARNER. Of course it is, and we are posted upon it. [Laughter.] Now let me show what the expenses will be. There are 150 polling places. The expense of getting these returns down to the governor at $5 a day, and you will not be able to get a miner at $10 a day to leave the mining districts at that time of the year. The mining district is the only place where you are going to hold an election. You are going to leave out the whole of the agricultural district, and only the miners are to be considered. It will cost for taking the returns, with a return trip of 150 messengers, $67,500, or $33,750 one way.

Mr. PAYNE. Are these returns sent down to Sitka?

Mr. WARNER. Yes; they are. There are two methods.

Mr. PAYNE. If they are sent there—I understand, according to the statement made, that about four-fifths of the population travel down toward that place about this time.

Mr. WARNER. About December.

Mr. PAYNE. Maybe you will find one of them that might go down for his expenses.

Mr. WARNER. The statute of limitations will bar him. The returns have to be there on the 10th of November.

Mr. PAYNE. But he will go a little earlier for that.

Mr. LACEY. Is it not a fact that after the certificate of election is made by the government, they will have to send a man from Sitka here to bring it to Washington.

Mr. WARNER. I presume it may be possible that it can come by mail.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WARNER. Certainly.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Is there anything in the bill that provides that the election returns have to be sent by messenger?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Not at all.

Mr. WARNER. Probably by wireless telegraphy.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Are there not mail routes from the settlements on the Yukon to Sitka?

Mr. WARNER. My understanding is there are mail routes between those places.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. The proof before the committee is that there are mail routes. Could not they be sent by mail, just as they are sent in my State of Maine and in other States?

Mr. WARNER. They might be sent by mail, but they could not be sent in the short time allowed in this bill. You had better send them by special messenger, and he would have to hustle.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. In evidence which was given before the committee, statements were made that the mails from the mining camps and settlements on the Yukon were carried to Sitka in ten days in the winter as well as in the summer.

Mr. WARNER. That may be from the Yukon to Sitka, because you have a railroad across the White Pass and water transportation, and during the summer you have steamboats, but that is simply on the river. The White Pass railroad is the only one in Alaska. That is the one running from Skagway. You are having only 150 polling places in the Territory, and there will be no representation except for the mining districts. There is no telling how long that population may stay in any one place. A man may come into the district and tell the miners that he has discovered a new field 250 miles away. He shows them a few nuggets and some dust, and the whole outfit drops the work and swarms off to the other place, and it is astonishing how quickly they can get there. The trouble is that it does not give representation to Alaska.

Mr. BOWIE. These people who are not represented in this bill have no representation here, have they?

Mr. WARNER. They have two or three gentlemen down here every winter. The governor of Alaska was here several winters, and he would be glad to spend every winter here if authorized so to do. There is no gentleman up there well fixed but is glad to come down here to spend the winter.

Mr. BOWIE. Leaving off the officials, is it not a fact that there are some people who, because of the inaccessibility of the country, can not be represented? Is that any reason why those who can get to the polling place should not be represented?

Mr. WARNER. They should be represented, but not in this way. If a Delegate is to be selected in this way under this bill, he will be elected by the people at Juneau, Skagway, Wrangell, Ketchikan, Nome, or Douglas Island. I think the best thing to do is to vote this bill down and send it back to the Committee on Territories, and let them bring in another bill providing that the governor of Alaska, or the President of the United States on the recommendation of the governor and the three district judges out there, appoint a Delegate from Alaska to represent it, or let the three district judges in Alaska recommend a man to be appointed by the President from Alaska.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. WARNER. I will.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Did not the gentleman aid in compiling what is known as the Alaska code?

Mr. WARNER. I did.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And we worked on that for weeks and weeks. Why did not the gentleman then, when he had all the time and all the knowledge that he now has, and certainly as much eloquence and flow of speech—why did not the gentleman then put into the Alaskan code a provision giving the Alaskans a Delegate?

Mr. WARNER. Because I did not think it necessary then, and I hardly think it is now.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman thought it was necessary to have a code of laws, and not have a man here to represent them in Congress?

Mr. WARNER. Certainly. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is objected by some that we should not have this Delegate appointed; that he should be elected by the people to represent Alaska. If he is elected by the people of Alaska he will be the only elective officer there except some municipal officers. The President appoints the governor, the secretary of state, the marshals, and the judges.

Now, a Delegate could be selected and appointed for the district of Alaska by either the President or the governor, who would perform the duties ably and in the interest of the people of that district, and it would cost the people of the United States only $6,000 or $7,000 at the most, and we would have no election contests from Skagway, Eagle, Nome, Wrangell, Juneau, Sitka, or Ketchikan. Let us give them a Delegate which will only cost $6,000 or $7,000 instead of $30,000 a year, and cut off all possibility of innumerable election contests.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be closed on the bill and that the pending substitute be now read.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman will allow me the interruption, I think that possibly we may dispose of the reading of the bill by unanimous consent as we all understand what it is, and that we can come to a vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, it is now after half past 5. The bill must be read and that would take half an hour. The bill will have to be read because a majority of the members have never read it. Why not move that the committee now rise and enter into an agreement to take it up again on Saturday morning?

Mr. PAYNE. Let me suggest, Mr. Chairman, that to-morrow is pension day, but I understand that pension matters will not take all the day, and the gentleman can undoubtedly get time to finish the bill after that.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I see no reason why we should not vote at the present time.

Mr. PAYNE. The bill will have to be read before it is passed, of course.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That will take half an hour.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SMITH of Iowa, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 9865, the Alaskan Delegate bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Speaker, I addressed the Committee of the Whole House and I would like to have leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

[Telegram.]

SANTA FE, N. MEX., January 22, 1903.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE OF THE SENATE,
Washington, D. C.

To the Senate of the United States Congress:

Your memorialists—the legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico—most respectfully represent that on the 2d day of February, A. D. 1848, by the treaty of Guadalupe Hildago, entered into between the United States and the Republic of Mexico, the territory embraced within the territory of New Mexico and Arizona was ceded to the United States. That by that treaty the Government of the United States solemnly pledged the people of the ceded territory that the same would be incorporated into the Union of the States, and the people thereof admitted to the enjoyment of all the rights of citizens of the United States. That the national conventions of the Republican and Democratic parties have repeatedly pledged the support of their representatives in the United States Senate and House of Representatives to the admission of the Territories of Oklahoma, New Mexico, and Arizona to the sisterhood of States. That the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States has, in compliance with the treaty obligations of the United States and the political obligations of its members, passed a bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, New Mexico, and Arizona to form constitutions, State governments, and to be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

That this bill has been transmitted to and is now pending in your honorable body without final action having been taken thereon. That bill embodies the hopes and aspirations of the people of New Mexico, who are well fitted to assume the form of government provided for in said bill, as is evidenced by the fact that New Mexico has made more educational progress during the last decade than any other part of the nation and has a common school system the peer of any in the nation; that within her boundaries there is taxable property of the value of more than $200,000,000, and that she has a sufficient population who have manifested their devotion and loyalty to the Government of the United States by furnishing more soldiers for the defense of the Government, according to population, in both the civil and Spanish-American wars, than any other State or other Territory in the nation.

In the opinion of your memorialists the people of Oklahoma and Arizona are likewise entitled to the blessings of statehood which will be secured to them by passing said bill, because the people of the Territories of Oklahoma, New Mexico, and Arizona have an inherent right to such an admission by virtue of the principles enunciated in the Declaration of Independence and because such admission is vouchsafed by the policy pursued by the Government of the United States in the admission of nearly all the States to the nation at a time when they were less fitted to assume self-government than are Oklahoma, New Mexico, and Arizona at the present time; because a Territorial form of government is intolerable and obnoxious to a free and ambitious people; because it is an incongruity under American institutions and should be maintained only so long as absolutely necessary to prepare its people for self-government; because it is a denial of the right of the people to take part in the affairs of the nation which requires allegiance and support from it, and because capital has not complete confidence in such a form of government and reluctantly lends its aid to the development of its resources.

We therefore most respectfully petition your honorable body to pass, at the earliest date possible consistent with the rights of and courtesies due to every one of the members of your honorable body, said bill (H. R. 12543) now pending and popularly known as the omnibus bill; and it is hereby

Resolved by the legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, That the chief clerks of the legislative council and house of representatives, respectively, are hereby directed to transmit certified copies of this memorial to the honorable President pro tempore of the Senate of the Congress of the United States; and it is hereby

Further resolved, That the president of the council and the speaker of the house of representatives be directed to telegraph a copy of this memorial to the President pro tempore of the Senate.

J. FRANCISCO CHAVES,
W. E. MARTIN,
Chief Clerk of Council.
NESTOR MONTOYA,
Speaker of the House.
C. V. SAFFORD,
Chief Clerk of the House.

SANTA FE, N. MEX., January 22, 1903.

PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C.:

The following joint resolution was passed by the unanimous vote of both houses of the legislative assembly of New Mexico to-day:

Joint resolution No. 1.

Be it resolved by the council and house of representatives of the thirty-fifth legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, That the thanks of the people of the Territory of New Mexico, through the thirty-fifth legislative assembly, are hereby extended to all those Senators who have by their voices, votes, and influence assisted thus far in our request for statehood as contained in H. R. 12543, commonly known as the omnibus statehood bill, and we earnestly pray their continued assistance in securing for us our rights as American citizens; and it is Further resolved, That the president of the council and the speaker of the house of representatives be directed to telegraph a copy of this joint resolution to the President pro tempore of the Senate of the United States, and that the chief clerk of the council be directed to have these resolutions printed and a copy thereof transmitted to each member of the Senate of the United States.

J. FRANCISCO CHAVES,
NESTOR MONTOYA,
Speaker of the House.
W. E. MARTIN,
Chief Clerk of Council.
CHARLES SAFFORD,
Chief Clerk of the House.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have read a petition of the Oklahoma Teachers' Association.

There being no objection the petition was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Whereas the Territory of Oklahoma and the Indian Territory are united in geographical location in the nature and character of their soil and climate and each is the complement of the other in those great natural resources which make a region fit for the home of a prosperous and enlightened people; and

Whereas the white people of the two Territories are united and bound together by common ties of relationship, habits, character, and social life, making their histories common and their destiny one; and

Whereas there are 150,000 white children of scholastic age in the Indian Territory who are absolutely deprived of the boon of public free schools and are the only subjects of the United States Government in either hemisphere that have been thus neglected; and

Whereas the parents of said children have made their homes in the Indian Territory at the invitation of the Indian tribal governments and at the earnest solicitation of the United States Government, and have by their labors transformed a wilderness into a land of civilization and orderly life: Therefore, be it

Resolved, By the Territorial Teachers' Association of the Territory of Oklahoma, that we petition the Congress of the United States to make provision for the immediate relief of our friends and neighbors by the enactment of laws which will authorize and provide for the establishment of a system of public schools in that area now embraced by the boundaries of the Indian Territory.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I have a large number of petitions here, which I do not intend to ask to have read, of course, because I do not wish to unnecessarily occupy the time of the Senate, but there are two or three I have taken up at random from Oklahoma itself, which are very brief, and I desire to have them read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks that the petition sent to the desk by him may be read.

There being no objection, the petition was read, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

We, the citizens of Chandler and Lincoln County, Okla., regardless of political party affiliation, in mass meeting assembled in the city of Chandler, this 8th day of December, 1902, hereby announce our belief in and allegiance to the single statehood principles enunciated by the recent resolutions of the Claremore statehood convention.

We desire to indorse and commend the broad and patriotic views of the Senate Committee on Territories as embodied in that committee's substitute bill, known as the Nelson bill, and which provides for single immediate statehood for Oklahoma and the Indian Territory.

We believe that any other policy than that which provides for the union of these twin Territories—so closely related socially and commercially, each so fairly and fully the complement of the other—upon an equal basis would be fraught with disaster to each, limit and cramp their boundaries and opportunities, and oppress their people with the burdensome and unnecessary taxation of dual State governments: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That we heartily indorse the Nelson statehood bill and urge its immediate enactment into law; and that a copy of these resolutions be furnished the local press and the original forwarded to Hon. C. B. Ames, at Washington, D. C., with a request that he present the same to the Senate Committee on Territories.

ROY HOFFMAN,
T. B. KNAPP,
J. D. PERKINS,
Committee on Resolutions.

Adopted without objection.

F. W. RASH, President.

Attest:

G. A. SMITH, Secretary.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Here is another brief petition, which I ask to have read.

There being no objection, the petition was read, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

PONCA CITY, OKLA., December 11, 1902.

To the Senate of the United States:

We, the undersigned business men and residents of the city of Ponca, Kay County, Okla., hereby indorse the action of the majority of the Senate Committee on Territories in its report recommending the admission of Oklahoma and Indian Territories as one State, and respectfully urge that both Territories be admitted as one State, as recommended by the majority report of said committee, for the reason that both Territories are so situated geographically and their interests so closely allied as to require the union of the two in one State, if the future welfare of the two Territories is to be considered and the present interests of both be promoted.

We therefore hope that the bill embodying the report of the majority of said committee be enacted into law, to the end that one great State be erected from the two Territories which will be a monument to the good judgment of the Congress which created it, and the pride of all citizens of said State.

Most respectfully submitted.

[Numerously signed.]

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I send to the desk the last petition which I shall ask to have read at this time.

There being no objection, the petition was read, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

At a meeting of the Oklahoma County Medical Society, a representative body of the medical profession of the Territory, and of indifferent tenor politically, which meeting occurred the 23d instant, the following resolution was moved, duly seconded, and passed unanimously by the society:

"Resolved, That this meeting unequivocally indorse the bill known as the Senate substitute for the omnibus bill, providing for the entrance into the Union of those Territories known as Oklahoma and Indian Territories as one State, under the name of Oklahoma."

Signed by the officers of the Oklahoma County Medical Society and copies forwarded to Senators BEVERIDGE and COCKRELL.

R. D. LONG, M. D., President.
W. J. BOYD, M. D., Secretary.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I have here a great number, several hundred, postal cards from the school children of the Indian Territory, which, of course, I do not intend to present and ask to have read at this time, but I send to the desk three or four of them. They consist of only one or two lines each. I ask that they may be read as they, perhaps, give the general tenor of the many hundreds of others which are their companions.

There being no objection, the Secretary read as follows:

PURCELL, IND. T., January 7, 1903.

Senator BEVERIDGE:

Please use your influence for the passage of the "Nelson bill."

MAY CARRICK.

PURCELL, IND. T., January 7, 1903.

Mr. BEVERIDGE:

It is my duty as a scholar at this school to write you a few lines and ask you to push the Nelson bill as much as possible, as we need more and public schools.

Yours, truly, HIMMIE SCHWARTZ.

PURCELL, IND. T., January 7, 1903.

DEAR SIR: We are in an awful shape down here, and want you to help us by passing the Nelson bill, if possible.

HOWARD L. GAMBLE.

PURCELL, IND. T., January 7, 1903.

Senator BEVERIDGE:

Please pass laws that will help school children in the Indian Territory.

EGGIE LEE BARTLETT.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the three or four postal cards which have been read are from school children in the Indian Territory, and that they are taken at random from a great many hundreds of similar postal cards, some of which I hold in my hand. I had them read to the Senate at this time in order that the Senate might see to what extent the agitation in favor of the union of these two Territories as one single and great State has gone.

As we have shown here before by petitions and letters from those people, and as was demonstrated by the great convention held at Oklahoma City, it is a matter which has reached the homes and the firesides and the schools of all the people. Perhaps it is an extraordinary circumstance (I doubt not it is the first time it has ever occurred in the history of this great body) that the Senate is memorialized and petitioned by the school children themselves.

Any Senator who may think that this has been inspired, as I have no doubt it has been suggested, can see from the language of the postal cards and the handwriting of the children themselves that it is an expression of their own individual feelings, representing their instincts and views, as well, no doubt, as those of their parents.

I shall not ask for a further reading of the petitions or postal cards or anything else at this time. I merely had two or three petitions read to show the Senate the growing feeling upon this question. Were it not that I do not want to consume the further time of the Senate I should ask that a large number of other petitions be read.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PROCTOR presented a petition of Reed and Rattan Workers' Union No. 8693, of Brattleboro, Vt., praying for the repeal of the desert-land law and the commutation clause of the homestead act; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented the petition of Rev. H. R. Miles and 60 other citizens of Brattleboro, Vt., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide an educational test for immigrants to this country; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PERKINS presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, Cal., praying that an appropriation be made for the erection and maintenance of an exposition building at Shanghai, China, and for the appointment of a commissioner in charge thereof; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, Cal., praying that an appropriation be made for the purchase of the Nacimiento ranch in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

USE OF WATER FOR GENERATING POWER.

Mr. MORGAN introduced a bill (S. 7090) to regulate the use of the waters of navigable water courses for the purpose of generating power by riparian proprietors, which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask that the bill be read at length.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That when any State, in virtue of the right of eminent domain on the shore of a navigable water course, or as the owner of the bed of such stream or body of water, grants the right or privilege of the use of such waters to a riparian proprietor for the purpose of generating or increasing power for driving machinery of any description at or near the site of any dam or lock constructed under an act of Congress for the benefit of the navigation of such stream or body of water, such right or privilege shall be subject to such limitation as will not interfere with the navigation of such stream, with such depth or volume of water as shall be prescribed in such act of Congress or in the plan of improvement under such act.

SEC. 2. That to acquire the right or privilege to use such waters for such purposes, under the authority of any State, the proprietor of such privilege, when it is obtained from a State wherein the land is situated, shall also obtain from the Secretary of War a permit to use such water. Such permit shall state the number of cubic feet of water per minute that such proprietor may use in such business, to be drawn from such water course, and it shall specify at what place or point provision shall be made for its return to the water course.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War shall grant a permit to such proprietor, when the quantity of water to be used for such purposes will not reduce the depth or volume of water in such water course, so as to impede or prevent its navigation at any place or in any stage of water, according to the requirements of the plan of work or improvement adopted by the Government. And Congress may at any time change the plan of such work although, in doing so, the permit granted by the Secretary of War is superseded or abridged as to the quantity of water that may be taken from such navigable stream.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask that the bill may lie on the table until to-morrow, when I shall submit some remarks upon it. It is a bill which is aimed at a response by a general law to a number of applications which are coming here for specific rights as to those waters where power is created by dams, locks, etc., erected by the Government of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama asks that the bill may lie on the table until to-morrow. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that that resolution may be passed over for the present, retaining its place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks that the resolution lie on the table, retaining its place. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I rise to a question of privilege. I ask that the letter which I send to the desk may be read. I do not propose to discuss it, but I wish to have the letter read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C. January 22, 1903.

Hon. GEORGE F. HOAR, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: The Republican platform of 1900 contained these words:

"We recognize that interest rates are a potent factor in production and business activity, and for the purpose of further equalizing and of further lowering the rates of interest, we favor such monetary legislation as will enable the varying needs of the season and of all sections to be promptly met, in order that trade may be evenly sustained, labor steadily employed, and commerce enlarged."

Inclosed please find a report upon the currency measure, which has been reported to the House and for which a rule has been granted.

This bill has the approval and support of the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Comptroller of the Currency, and the Director of the Mint.

If any portion of the report or bill which is appended should not be clear to you, I would thank you for calling my attention to it.

Very truly, yours,

CHARLES N. FOWLER.

Mr. HOAR. Let the letter lie upon the table. As I have said, I have no desire to say anything about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will lie upon the table. The morning business is completed.

REGULATION OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. FAIRBANKS and Mr. QUAY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. FAIRBANKS] first addressed the Chair.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President, I gave notice yesterday that I would this morning move to take up the immigration bill. When I gave the notice I understood it would be quite agreeable to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] having charge of the statehood bill that the residue of the morning hour should be given to the consideration of the immigration bill. I ask the Senator if he is still willing that the Senate should proceed with the consideration of that bill.

Mr. QUAY. I regret to say that I can not concur in the suggestion. I acceded to the request of the Senator from Indiana yesterday morning with the understanding that no time would be occupied in the discussion of the bill. Since then the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] has informed me that he desires to address the Senate upon the question before the final passage of the bill; and he is detained from the Senate today by a sad affliction in his family. Therefore I can not consent to proceeding with the immigration bill now.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania whether we can not agree upon an hour some day next week—say Thursday—when the immigration bill may be taken up and disposed of?

Mr. QUAY. I will agree, so far as I am concerned, if unanimous consent can be had to fix a day for the final vote on the bill. That will accomplish, I suppose, what the Senator desires.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I suggest that we agree to vote upon the immigration bill at 3 o'clock on Thursday next.

Mr. QUAY. I have no objection whatever to that.

Mr. SPOONER. Does that mean to preclude discussion?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Not at all.

Mr. LODGE. I suggest that the bill be taken up immediately after the routine morning business on Thursday next.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I ask unanimous consent that the immigration bill may be taken up at the conclusion of the routine morning business on next Thursday, and that a vote be had thereon at 3 o'clock.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, the unanimous-consent agreement of course is not to interfere with the regular order of business. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE. Not to displace it?

Mr. QUAY. Not to displace the regular order after 2 o'clock on Thursday.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Not to displace the regular order after 3 o'clock on Thursday.

Mr. QUAY. No; I want the regular order to proceed after 2 o'clock. We may as well vote before 2 o'clock.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania agree that the vote may be taken at 2 o'clock on Thursday next?

Mr. QUAY. Yes; I agree to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent that a vote may be taken on the bill known as the immigration bill, on all pending amendments and on the amendments that may be then offered at 2 o'clock on Thursday next.

Mr. QUAY. The Senator from Indiana will understand that I have no authority upon that point to speak for anyone but myself. I do not object at any time to fixing a date for a vote upon any bill that is before this body.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. CLAY. As a member of the Immigration Committee, I am anxious to see the bill passed, but without two or three of the amendments which have been adopted. I desire to say to the Senator from Indiana, that to take up this bill on Thursday next, and without any debate and without a chance to discuss two or three of the amendments, would be unfair to some of us who oppose certain features of the bill.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. The request does not exclude debate at all. The Senator is aware that the bill is now in the Senate, and my request is that we vote upon the bill at 2 o'clock on Thursday next. The Senator will have ample time to express his views upon any proposed amendment before that hour.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, as I understood the request of the Senator from Indiana, it was that the bill should be taken up immediately after the conclusion of the routine morning business on Thursday next, which would give an hour and a half for discussion, and it will be perfectly easy to extend the agreement so as to meet at 11 o'clock, and thus give additional time.

The bill has passed the Committee of the Whole and is in the Senate. There are no amendments pending, but there undoubtedly will be a separate vote on one or two of the amendments adopted as in Committee of the Whole. I do not think, except on the part of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], that there is any desire for general discussion. There is certainly none on the part of the committee. The bill has been very thoroughly gone over. I think two or three hours of discussion would enable us to dispose of it.

Mr. CLAY. As I understand it, if the bill has been reported to the Senate, that will not prevent amendments from being offered?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly not.

Mr. CLAY. I desire to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that there is one amendment of the committee which has gone into the bill that ought to be taken out. That is the amendment which provides that if immigrants coming to this country should within two years after they come here become insane, the burden shall be upon such insane persons to prove that they did not inherit their insanity.

There is another feature of the bill to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate, and that is the provision which fixes the per capita tax at $3. The report of the Committee on Immigration clearly shows that it will not cost more than one-half that amount to administer the law.

There is another amendment, to which I shall not now call attention; but I do not believe we can dispose of the bill in an hour or two hours. If we had three or four hours to discuss it, we probably could dispose of it and pass it, but it would be manifestly unjust to some of us who do not believe the bill ought to pass in its present shape to take it up and discuss it simply for an hour and then put it on its passage. Therefore I am compelled to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. QUAY. I suggest that it would be better under the circumstances and that the Senator from Indiana would probably consult the safety of his bill by withdrawing his request for the present in order to see if some other accommodation can not be made about his bill.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I withdraw the request for the present, and will confer with the Senator from Pennsylvania later with a view to agreeing upon a day for a final vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request is withdrawn.

THE STATEHOOD BILL.

Mr. QUAY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the statehood bill.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. There is no objection to that.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] rose during the morning hour and desired to be recognized, and the Chair stated he would recognize him immediately after the routine morning business was completed.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not want to interfere with the Senator from Pennsylvania in getting his bill before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The statehood bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] yield to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]?

Mr. QUAY. Certainly.

F. M. VOWELLS.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 1592) for the relief of F. M. Vowells.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him, which will be read to the Senate for its information.

The Secretary read the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That in auditing and settlement of the claims of F. M. Vowells as an officer in Company H, Sixth Regiment of Kentucky Cavalry Volunteers, for his services he shall be allowed and paid the pay and allowances of a second lieutenant of said company from the 1st day of August, 1863, to the 14th day of July, 1865, less any amount paid him as such lieutenant.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the report may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. COCKRELL on the 13th instant, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1592) for the relief of F. M. Vowells, have duly considered the same and submit the following report:

On this bill a report of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives is as follows:

"The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1592) for the relief of F. M. Vowells, report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

"Frank M. Vowells, as shown by the records of the War Department, was enrolled July 10, 1862, was mustered into service and appointed sergeant of Company H, Sixth Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry, on September 15, 1862; that he was commissioned a second lieutenant instead of Isaac Graham, promoted August 1, 1863, and that he was borne on the rolls and present subsequent to that date as second lieutenant until he was honorably discharged as of that grade on July 14, 1865.

"It appears from the proof heard that when he was commissioned lieutenant he applied to L. D. Watkins, the colonel then commanding his regiment, for leave to go to the rear to muster as such lieutenant; that to this request Colonel Watkins replied that they were just before the enemy; that his services at the front were needed, and that he would see to it that his right to pay of that rank would not be affected by his failure to muster, and that in obedience to duty and relying upon the assurance of his superior he obeyed the order. It is shown beyond controversy that the man served his country faithfully in the capacity above mentioned from August 1, 1863, to July 14, 1865; that he was commissioned to do; that he was paid as such up to October 31, 1864; that it was not his fault that he did not muster as second lieutenant, and that he was led to believe it unnecessary that he should. It is as conclusively shown that he was not paid anything after October 31, 1864, either as a private or officer. Under the facts proved, your committee recommend that the bill do pass."

The official record shows that Frank M. Vowells, late second lieutenant Company H, Sixth Regiment Kentucky Cavalry, was paid a salary as such from July 1, 1863, to October 1, 1864; that he was commissioned second lieutenant, vice Isaac Graham, promoted, August 1, 1863; that he was borne as second lieutenant on subsequent rolls, and was honorably discharged as of that grade July 14, 1865.

Your committee believe that, having performed the duties of that position during all that time, he is entitled to that pay from August 1, 1863, to July 14, 1865, and therefore report back the bill favorably with an amendment by striking out all after the enacting clause and substituting as follows:

"That in auditing and settlement of the claims of F. M. Vowells as an officer in Company H, Sixth Regiment of Kentucky Cavalry Volunteers, for his services, he shall be allowed and paid the pay and allowances of a second lieutenant of said company from the 1st day of August, 1863, to the 14th day of July, 1865, less any amount paid him as such lieutenant."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, which has been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

JULIUS A. KAISER.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to his colleague?

Mr. QUAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6649) for the relief of Julius A. Kaiser.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, which will be read in full to the Senate for its information.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Julius A. Kaiser upon the retired list of the Navy, in the grade of passed assistant engineer, as of the date he was entitled by law or navy regulations to examination for promotion from assistant engineer to said grade.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania kindly make some explanation of that bill?

Mr. PENROSE. A similar bill has passed the Senate twice heretofore, and this bill has passed the other House at this session.

Mr. SPOONER. Many bills have passed both Houses that ought not to pass.

Mr. PENROSE. I will ask to have the report of the committee read. The bill has been unanimously reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs each time it has been introduced.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. GALLINGER on the 20th instant, as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6649) for the relief of Julius A. Kaiser, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it pass.

The committee adopts the report of the House Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom the bill was referred in the House, which is as follows:

"The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6649) for the relief of Julius A. Kaiser, having considered the same, report it back with the recommendation that it pass, and adopt the report made on a similar bill in the Fifty-sixth Congress, first session, as follows:

"The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 405) for the relief of Julius A. Kaiser, having carefully considered the same, report the same back with the recommendation that it pass, and adopt the reports made on similar bills by said committee in the Fifty-fifth, Fifty-second, and Forty-eighth Congresses, as follows:

[House Report No. 133, Fifty-fifth Congress, second session.]

"The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1579) for the relief of Julius A. Kaiser, submit the following report:

"Similar bills with this one have heretofore been considered by the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House and Senate during the Forty-eighth, Forty-ninth, Fifty-first, Fifty-second, and Fifty-fourth Congresses, and the facts and conclusions thereon then fully ascertained and reported to both Houses.

"Your committee, after fully considering the whole case, ask leave to adopt the report submitted by them in the Fifty-fourth Congress, and again recommend the passage of the bill."

[House Report No. 2346, Fifty-second Congress, second session.]

"The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bills (H. R. 1306 and H. R. 5697) for the relief of Julius A. Kaiser, submit the following report:

"The facts out of which this bill for relief arises will be found stated in House Report No. 534, Forty-eighth Congress, a copy of which is hereto appended as a part of this report. Your committee concur in the conclusions stated in these reports and report back the bill (H. R. 1306) and recommend its passage, and ask that H. R. 5697, of similar import, be laid on the table.

[House Report No. 534, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.]

"The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1348) for the relief of Julius A. Kaiser, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to submit the following report:

"Julius A. Kaiser is now an assistant engineer on the retired list of the Navy, having been retired on the 8th day of July, 1873, for disability incident to the service. It appears that the injury by which he was incapacitated for active service was a compound fracture of the forearm, received on January 1, 1870, while making some repairs to the machinery of the United States steamer Ashuelot. Although injured on January 1, 1870, he was not ordered before the retiring board until July, 1873, a period of three and one-half years, during all of which time he continued on duty on the Asiatic Station.

"Long before the time of his retirement he had completed the sea service required by regulation of the Navy Department to entitle him to promotion, but by reason of his absence in the Asiatic Station, and for other causes not involving fault on his part, he was not examined for promotion.

"Had he been so examined for promotion he would, under section 1562, Revised Statutes, have been entitled to the pay of passed assistant engineer from the date of completion of the sea service required by the regulations of the Navy Department.

"He completed the sea service on the 19th day of January, 1870, and was consequently entitled to the pay of a passed assistant engineer from that date but for the fact that his absence on duty prevented his examination.

"It appears that the other officers of his date, while not actually promoted until 1874, were given rank and pay under the section above referred to from the time they became entitled—one from the 19th of October, 1869, the other from the 31st of March, 1870.

"Mr. Kaiser's record in the service is exceptionally good. He served with distinction throughout the war, having much service on the monitors, which was justly considered the most arduous character of service.

"It seems to your committee that Mr. Kaiser is entitled to be put in the position which his actual service entitled him at the time of his retirement, and of which only the requirements of the service and no fault of his own deprived him, viz, to be promoted to passed assistant engineer from the date from which he was entitled by law and regulation to the rank and pay of that position.

"Your committee therefore recommend the adoption of this report and the passage of the bill."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GILMAN B. JOHNSON.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 6983, a pension bill, which requires immediate attention if it is to do the beneficiary any good.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill which will be read for information.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I have the floor, I believe.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. QUAY. I desire to say that I shall not object to the bill of the Senator from New Hampshire, provided it elicits no discussion and there is no call for the reading of the report.

Mr. LODGE. Is it not a matter of right to have a report read?

Mr. QUAY. Calls for the reading of reports have become fashionable this morning.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator mean that no business shall be transacted here except the statehood bill where the reading of a report may be asked for in connection with a bill?

Mr. QUAY. Then I will merely object.

Mr. GALLINGER. I hope the Senator will not object to this pension bill. This is a case where the soldier may not live long enough to derive any benefit from the bill if its passage should be delayed until to-morrow. I do not think the reading of the report will be called for in this case. Let the bill at least be read.

Mr. LODGE. I admit the power of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] to the fullest degree, but I do not admit that he has any right to stop the reading of a report.

Mr. SPOONER. As I understand it, we have the right to have a report read.

Mr. QUAY. Certainly that is true, but I have the right to object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. QUAY. And I am giving notice that I will object to the consideration of bills if the reading of any more reports shall be called for.

Mr. GALLINGER. The bill will be withdrawn if there is any call for the reading of the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill referred to by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 6983) granting an increase of pension to Gilman B. Johnson. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Gilman B. Johnson, late first lieutenant and regimental quartermaster Eleventh Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, and to pay him a pension of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REVENUE CUTTER FOR THE HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

Mr. PERKINS. I request the Senator from Pennsylvania to kindly yield that I may ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 6534.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SPOONER. I shall object to the consideration of the bill unless the report can be read or the Senate can be informed of the nature of the bill.

Mr. PERKINS. I will state that the bill is for the construction of a revenue cutter for use in the Hawaiian Islands. The report consists of about a dozen lines, being a recommendation from the Treasury Department. This cutter is an absolute necessity. The bill is in the interest of the public service, and I am sure my friend from Wisconsin always advocates anything which is for the benefit of our common country.

Mr. SPOONER. As the bill has been explained, I shall not object.

Mr. QUAY. I shall not object to this bill, but I give notice that I shall object to any further consideration of bills by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill named by him. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 6534) providing for the construction of a vessel of the first class for the Revenue-Cutter Service, to be stationed with headquarters at Honolulu, Hawaii. It appropriates $225,000 for the construction, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, of a steam vessel of the first class for the Revenue-Cutter Service, to be stationed with headquarters at Honolulu, Hawaii.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STATEHOOD BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. QUAY. I should be pleased to have a vote, Mr. President, unless some Senator is ready to proceed.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Is this the statehood bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The statehood bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I was engaged in conversation. I thought the Senator said something about there being no further argument.

Mr. QUAY. I said I should be glad to have a vote unless some Senator was ready to proceed.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator need not worry; somebody will be prepared to argue this question.

Mr. QUAY. I am prepared to listen.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BURNHAM] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. President——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire to yield to me for a few minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BURNHAM. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I merely desire very briefly to conclude what I was saying on yesterday when the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] moved to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Indiana yield to the Chair for one moment?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There were two or three colloquies yesterday in the Senate, when it seemed almost impossible that the Reporters could hear what Senators had to say. The Chair calls the attention of the Senate to it and to the importance of Senators addressing the Chair, being recognized, and then in the course of their remarks not turning their backs entirely to the Reporters, thus making it difficult to have their speeches properly reported.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think that a large number of Senators were on their feet at the same time yesterday afternoon, and the interest in the bill became intense and in some places pointed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to say one other word, which is that no Senator, under any circumstances, sitting in his seat, should undertake to address the Senate.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not know who it was that did not make the Reporters hear, but I remember there were a great many Senators talking at the same time.

Mr. President, a discussion arose yesterday which afforded an illustration of an immediate character in support of one of the contentions of the committee. I was proceeding to address the Senate upon that point, in answer to some other Senators who had spoken, when the motion for adjournment came.

Attention was called by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] to the fact that Virginia City, Nev., had at the time of the admission of that State a population of some 25,000 or 30,000 and that at present it has a population of four or five thousand. This astonishing decrease in population, Mr. President, is no longer astonishing when we consider its cause, and its cause is in common with the reason for the decrease of population in the entire State. The Senator furnished the reason himself. He said it was a mining town.

That, Mr. President, is the precise point which is made concerning population based upon the industry of mining. Necessarily it is not permanent. It would not be permanent if the hopes of the mine owners, in which we all share, should be realized. It is inevitable that a time shall come in the operation of mines like those containing copper and gold and silver when the deposits shall be exhausted; and the bunches and clusters of population that surround those spots for the reason of that industry depart when the industry ceases. Therefore we had in the speech of the Senator from Nevada yesterday afternoon a signal illustration of the instability and insufficiency for statehood of a population based upon that industry.

The committee, in its report, referred to the history of Tombstone, Ariz. It is not long since Tombstone, Ariz., was known through all the country as one of the richest, most vigorous, and most prosperous of mining camps in the country. But the water filled the mines, or for some reason or other they ceased their operations, and so that population of thousands shrank to hundreds.

So, Mr. President, I was proceeding to show, upon the statement of the Senator from Nevada, that if nothing but a mining industry is a base for population, it is too great a hazard to take in a population, however vast at the present moment, that has no assurance of its continuance except its dependence upon this particular industry.

In the case of Arizona the mineral deposits of the Territory are not only admitted, they are asserted by the committee. If I could, I should be quite as willing as any advocate and lover of that Territory to paint in as brilliant colors as possible the prospects of the mineral resources and deposits there—prospects though they to a certain extent merely are. But, conceding that they exist, the history furnished by the Senator from Nevada yesterday shows how unstable such a population is.

Now, Mr. President, suppose it to be true—and it is stated by all the witnesses before the committee; it is stated by every person who has made an argument upon that side; it was stated by the Senator from Ohio, I believe, and if I am not correct he will of course not permit me to make the statement—that the chief industry of Arizona at present is mining. It was further stated by the Senator from Ohio that we now have introduced into this industry, instead of old and slow and toilsome processes of prosecuting it, improved machinery that does in a day by one man's hand what scores of men could not do in a month before. Now, what does that mean, Mr. President? It means three things—the more speedy enrichment of the owners of the property; the more speedy depletion of the deposits they seek, and therefore, the more speedy decrease of the population there suddenly assembled.

I put it to any Senator whether he thinks it is just to the rest of the population of the United States that a State should be admitted which has this industry alone. I do not claim that Arizona has this industry alone. I will come to that in a minute, and at some future time more completely. What I was trying to impress upon the Senate is that where it is admitted that a Territory, when it becomes a State, shall bear some fair proportion in its population to the population of the rest of the Republic, the further condition should be that there should be some reasonable expectation that the population will be permanent. If it is admitted—and the Senator from Ohio has admitted—that a State ought to have some fair proportion of population compared with the population of the rest of the Republic, and if it be established that that fair proportion exists, and if it be further established that that population is not permanent, then it is not established at all. Because when you admit it with 500,000 people, or a hundred and fifty thousand, or any other number, and that population is based upon an industry the nature of which is precarious, and that population diminishes—as in the case of Tombstone, Ariz., as in the case of Virginia City, Nev.—then you have destroyed the very thing which you admit is necessary before a Territory shall be admitted as a State.

Mr. President, that much upon the question of population based upon the industry of mining. In this, I desire not only to disavow, but to assert that there is no reflection upon the mineral deposits of Arizona or any other part of this Union. It has been stated that because the committee reported adversely to the admission of that Territory as a State in the Union—a question of statesmanship and not a business question—the committee reflected upon that Territory as a place for good investment. How absurd! It could not have been suggested except by an interested and partial mind. If men are interested in the industry of mining, they are not interested in it in order that they may have statehood or anything else. They are interested in it in order that they may get rich by it; and that is perfectly proper. Then, of course, if they are afterwards interested in it because they want to come to the Senate, that is perfectly proper, too. But the desire of a man to come to the United States Senate is hardly a sufficient basis on which to admit a Territory as big as all New England, New York, and Pennsylvania put together, and yet has a population, including 30,000 Indians not taxed, only as large as that of some of the very small towns of Pennsylvania.

I wish again to assert in the most positive terms—because we have seen that we have to be clear and distinct in our statements and emphatic as well or we will be misrepresented and accused of libeling somebody or something—that I do not state nor do the committee, nor does any person who agrees with the committee, that mining is the only industry down there. It is merely stated—repeating the language of the Senator from Ohio and all the witnesses—that it is the principal industry and, therefore, the principal thing upon which population depends.

For example, it was stated by the Senator from Ohio that the census was inaccurate because, at Bisbee, the chief mining camp there, more men were at work in the mines than were returned by the census enumerators. I can go even further than the Senator and say that at the time the census was taken Bisbee was not an incorporated town at all. Now it is a city—a city of a day and night's growth. I hope it will be a permanent city; but we have no assurance that it will be; and do we dare under our oaths as Senators, owing a duty to the people of this Republic, to admit a State or a number of people, however excellent they may be in quality, however earnest their desire, who next year may not be there.

Suppose, Mr. President, that in Arizona there were Virginia City, Nev., and Tombstone and Bisbee, and several other cities like them. Suppose the fate should overtake all of them that has already overtaken two of them, and suppose while in their flourishing condition we had admitted this Territory as a State. Suppose next year the mines gave out, the lode became exhausted, water had flooded the mines, and as in the case of Virginia City and as in the case of Tombstone, Ariz., and as in the case of a large number of instances which I could occupy all day in naming (and I think I shall some time give a list of the mines formerly, but not now, in operation in Arizona)—suppose, I say, that those people should leave and go into another Territory, the only one left, having been admitted as a State upon the basis that those people were there. Suppose they should leave and go into another Territory, and then we should admit that Territory as a State on the basis that those people are there at that minute. Suppose, then, that the mines in the new State should give out. Mr. President, it would not be very long until 80,000,000 people in the United States would have their laws made for them by the smallest fraction of the population of the United States.

Now, it is no answer to that to say that Senators here from such communities are most excellent Senators. They are. But the point is that it denies a government for, of, and by the people, because equal representation after all, not of sections, as was suggested by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] in his clever speech the other day, but of the people, is the great democratic principle upon which our whole theory of government rests.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PETTUS in the chair). Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. In this connection will the Senator from Indiana permit me to remind him that the ordinance of 1787 safeguarded the principle of proportionate representation in the local legislatures?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am very happy to be reminded of that fact; and I hope the Senator from Wisconsin——

Mr. FORAKER. I was unable to hear the inquiry of the Senator from Wisconsin. I should like to hear it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I was unable to hear the inquiry of the Senator from Wisconsin, and if it is not asking too much I would be obliged if he would kindly repeat it.

Mr. SPOONER. I made no inquiry. I stated a fact.

Mr. FORAKER. Well.

Mr. SPOONER. And that fact is that the ordinance of 1787, which has been so much exploited here, if I may use that word without being offensive, safeguarded the principle of proportionate representation of the people in the local legislatures thereafter to be created under its provisions.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And it provided that there should not be a government of square miles, whether occupied or not, but a government of people assembled on land.

Mr. President, that brings to my mind another thought, suggested by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] the other day. I called his attention to it, but in the sweep of his able argument he forgot it. I asked the Senator from Ohio the other day whether or not he agreed to the rule to which he so forcibly referred, and the history of which he traced with vividness—I am not sure with entire accuracy—the unit of representation rule; and I understood the Senator to say that he did; that is, that a State shall have a population at least equal to the unit of representation.

Mr. President, if that is so and if that is the position of the Senator from Ohio——

Mr. FORAKER. That is not what I said. The Senator is perfectly aware that what I said was that as to certain Territories, those carved out of territory acquired by these treaties, the unit rule had been applied in determining whether or not they had a right, a contractual, a treaty right, to ask for admission, but that it was always within the power of Congress to admit a Territory when it had a population less than the unit of representation.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Oh, certainly; we all agree that Congress has power to admit a Territory of many thousand square miles with only 5 people in it, so far as power goes. But I call the Senator's attention to the fact that I asked him whether or not he stood upon the rule of the unit of representation. The Senator said he did, and then I followed that question by asking the Senator how about Arizona? The Senator said I supposed I was asking him a bothersome question. I said "not at all," and he said he would answer it later. But the Senator forgot to do so. Is that correct?

Mr. FORAKER. That is entirely incorrect. A reference to the remarks made at the time will show that as soon as I could reach it in order, and only a paragraph or two intervening, I proceeded to answer it, saying I had been contending as to what the rule was, and the rule having been established, I then proposed to show that Arizona presented a case which justified Congress in admitting her to statehood before she had a populatian equal to the unit of representation. I proceeded to show why we should be justified by pointing out her industrial conditions, her population, her business activity, and great annual products, not only of mines, but of other industries and other kinds of business.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That very much clears up the situation, for I was going to point out that Arizona would fail under any rule that has been here suggested. Of course Arizona would come under the power of Congress, as to which everybody agrees, to admit any Territory, however large, with any number of people, no matter how small and no matter of what kind and character.

But the Senator said that in this instance we were justified in not observing the rule of the unit of representation and in admitting Arizona before that time. I suggest that the exact reverse is true, considering the facts and the proper deductions to be made from them, because most of the population, at least half of the population, depends upon the industry of mining. I suppose half, after you exclude 30,000 Indians out of the 123,000 people there. Then perhaps there is some grazing and farming, but it is chiefly mining, and we have seen, as demonstrated by the remarks of the Senator from Nevada yesterday, that the history of all mining camps in this country is that population based on mining, no matter how brilliant its present condition, no matter how promising its immediate future, no matter how vast the output from its mines, is certain, in the nature of things, not to be permanent.

If the Senator will read the testimony of the superintendent of the great Phelps, Dodge & Co. mines, at Bisbee, the greatest copper mines, with perhaps one or two exceptions, in the world, he will find it there shown that they have run channels—levels they call them—in various directions in the mountains. Copper does not lie in veins. It is in sacs or deposits. They have worked out many of the deposits. They hope and believe that the time is far distant when all those deposits shall be exhausted, and yet the nature of the case, the elements of the situation, show that the time must come when they will be worked out; and, furthermore, those elements of the situation are confirmed by the universal history of the mining industry.

That is not saying anything against the mining industry. We should all be highly delighted to own some mines ourselves, and I think Arizona in many of its parts will be a most excellent place for investment in mining; but that is no reason why it is a good place for investment in statehood. They are two separate industries.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Will the Senator from Indiana permit me?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. McCOMAS. I do not desire by any inquiry to divert the Senator from Indiana from his observations.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am happy to have the inquiry.

Mr. McCOMAS. But the Senator said that the mining industry and the statehood industry are two distinct industries. That brings to my mind several things as to which I want to ask information. The Senator is full of information on this subject.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No; very limited.

Mr. McCOMAS. I have not seen, nor do I remember to have heard of until now, a serious, earnest discussion, in the other House or in this, prolonged, respecting the admission of these Territories as States, and I have read the reports on both sides and have looked in vain for a single reason for the present urgency. My question is a long one, but I should like the Senator to understand it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I see your question.

Mr. McCOMAS. The admission of the Territories is urged now, and I have sought to find, or to hear some one assign good reasons why they should be admitted this January, and if they fail, why substantial justice could not be done next January. We find an instant, pressing, urging of this proposition, on which I have been endeavoring to inform myself. There is an incessant, unceasing urgency for the immediate admission of these States now; no other time but now.

It postpones legislation in respect of trusts, in respect of interstate commerce, the regular and orderly passage of appropriation bills, and other important and pressing matters—for instance, the immigration bill, which ought to have been passed long ago and should at once be operative, and has reason for operation this January instead of next January. I ask the Senator from Indiana if he can tell me, or if he has encountered anything in this discussion and argument to which I have not paid attention, showing a good reason why we should neglect all the public business, turn it aside, give no heed to other things, and press forward to a speedy vote this proposition. My question is why should it not be allowed to go over and more urgent matters be taken up? I ask the Senator for such information.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Like the Senator, I have not heard presented in the discussion in the Senate or by the report of any committee, or anywhere in the literature published to the people and public upon this subject, any reason for the policy of instantaneousness to which the Senator from Maryland refers.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator from Indiana has answered to his entire satisfaction the very impressive question that has just been addressed to him by the Senator from Maryland, I should like to call the Senator's attention, in answer to what he has been saying as to the impossibility of there being any growth in the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona, to like statements made in the Senate of the United States at the time when we were acquiring New Mexico, in order that the Senator may see that statesmen as great as he would claim to be have been worse——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No; as great as I would claim the Senator from Ohio to be.

Mr. FORAKER. Well, I do not mean to make anything personal.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. But you did.

Mr. FORAKER. I will change it. I will say that statesmen as great as any we can claim to have have been grossly mistaken as to the possibilities of New Mexico and Arizona. I have before me what I was unable to find in the hurry of the moment when I was addressing the Senate formally a few days ago, a speech made by Daniel Webster on the 23d day of March, 1848, when they had under consideration the acquisition of New Mexico and California.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator did quote from Daniel Webster the other day.

Mr. FORAKER. I did not quote this. I quoted what Daniel Webster said as to Lower California.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes.

Mr. FORAKER. I quoted his statement that that flower garden of the world, as it is to-day, was a valueless waste about which nobody need be concerned. Now, I want to quote what he said about New Mexico and Arizona, for at that time New Mexico included Arizona.

Mr. Webster said:

> Well, then, as to New Mexico, there can be no more people there. The man is ignorant, stupid, who has looked at the map of New Mexico and read the accounts of it, who supposes there can be any more people there than there is now—some sixty or seventy thousand. It is an old, settled country, the people living along in the bottom of this valley on the two sides of a little stream, a garter of land only on one side and the other, filled by coarse landholders and miserable peons. It can sustain, not only under this cultivation, but under any cultivation that our American race should ever submit to, no more people than there are there now. There will, then, be two Senators for 60,000 inhabitants in New Mexico to the end of our lives and to the end of the lives of our children.

I want to read further from the same speech. I am reading from page 534 of part 1, Congressional Globe, Thirtieth Congress, first session, March 23, 1848.

> Sir, we take New Mexico and California. Who is weak enough to think that there is an end? Why, do we not hear it avowed every day that it is proper for us also to take Sonora and Tamaulipas, and other provinces or States of northern Mexico? Who thinks that the hunger for dominion will stop here of itself? Somebody has said that this acquisition is so mean and lean and unsatisfactory that we shall seek no further.
> In my judgment, sir, you may believe that, if you can believe that a rapacious animal that has made one unproductive foray won't try for a better; but further, there are some things that we can argue against with temper and submit to, if overruled, without mortification. There are other things that seem to affect one's consciousness of being a reasonable man and evince a disposition to impose upon his common sense. And of this class of topics or pretensions, I have never heard of anything and can not conceive of anything more ridiculous in itself, more absurd, and more affrontive to all sober judgment than the cry that we are getting indemnity.

The claim had been made that we should get indemnity for our expenses in the Mexican war by taking this territory, although we had to pay something to avoid taking more indemnity than we were entitled to. He said:

> Indemnity by the acquisition of New Mexico and California! I hold them not to be worth a dollar, and we pay for them a vast sum of money. We have expended, as everybody knows, large treasures in the prosecution of the war, and now what is there to constitute indemnity? What do gentlemen mean by it? Let us see how this matter stands. We get a country. We get a country, in the first instance, either by cession or acknowledgment of boundary—I care not which way you state it—the country between the Nueces and the Rio Grande. What this country is appears from a publication of an honorable gentleman in the other House—

This "honorable gentleman" takes the place in this instance of the honorable committee which visited the Territory and made a report from "investigation on the ground"—

> What this country is appears from a publication of an honorable gentleman in the other House in which he quotes an account given by Major Gaines. He says that the country is worth nothing; that he would not hazard the life of a single individual for every foot of land from San Patricio to the valley of the Rio Grande.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does the Senator from Ohio find any such——

Mr. FORAKER (reading):

> This gentleman has been there lately——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator excuse me?

Mr. FORAKER. Let me read one more sentence:

> This gentleman has been there lately and is well acquainted with the condition of the country. So far, then, as that part of our acquisition is concerned, I take it for granted it is not worth a dollar.

And much more to the same effect.

What I wanted to call the Senator's attention to is the fact that statesmen have been mistaken before, as we think the Senator is mistaken now. Certainly we all know that Mr. Webster was mistaken when he made the statements which have been quoted in this debate in regard to the absolute valuelessness of Lower California, and that he was mistaken as to the value of New Mexico and Arizona when he made the statement I have just read.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, the Senator has studied logic, and he therefore knows that the frailest form of reasoning is analogy. But even that most easily misleading form of reasoning goes limp and halt when one leg does not correspond with the other.

Now, I ask the Senator to please point out what inference he draws by the statements of Daniel Webster concerning this Territory. Does the committee make any such statement as that? Not at all, Mr. President. Has anyone made such a statement as that? At least I have heard none such, Mr. President.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator was contending that that country was of such an uncertain nature as to its development, the development of population, the development of the mining industry, the development of every other kind of industry, we could not with any safety expect it to have a future that would justify statehood.

Mr BEVERIDGE. No, Mr. President, that simply shows that I had only the divided attention of the Senator. He was engaged in listening to me with his ears, and he was looking at what Mr. Webster said with his eyes. The remark which he attributes to me did not cover the whole situation in those Territories at all. It was addressed to the single industry of mining, and the point was that population based on mining alone could not be permanent. Does the Senator say that such a population is permanent? I ask the Senator the question.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I suppose that depends upon the condition of the mines.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Just so.

Mr. FORAKER. Population would stay there as long as the mines held out.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Just so.

Mr. FORAKER. In Arizona they seem to be holding out remarkably well.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. At Tombstone, for instance?

Mr. FORAKER. They are multiplying day by day. People are flocking in there to open up mines and develop that industry. Over $33,000,000 in the grand aggregate was the product of Arizona last year. I do not remember exactly how much of that was from mining, but the principal part of it was from mines, I understand.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, the Senator will admit that, important as the product of the mines may be, statehood is not to be given on product alone, but on the number of inhabitants as well. Now, I ask the Senator to state this: To what does the Senator attribute the enormous decrease—that is not an adjective strong enough—of the population of Virginia City, Nev., and of Tombstone, Ariz.?

Mr. FORAKER. I am not familiar with the local conditions at those places.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Well, the mines gave out or got filled with water.

Mr. FORAKER. But the Senator has stated as though it were a rule agreed upon that property has nothing to do with the question. Therefore it is not proper to be discussing it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. On the contrary, I said it had much to do with it.

Mr. FORAKER. There is a condition——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators must be in order. This debate must not degenerate into a conversation.

Mr. FORAKER. As I understand it, I have the floor, and I was answering the Senator from Indiana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is correct.

Mr. FORAKER. The conversational part was interjected by the Senator from Indiana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio will proceed.

Mr. FORAKER. I want to proceed with all proper respect.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator from Ohio yield to me?

Mr. FORAKER. I know the Senator from Indiana does not like to have me take time——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Chair will find on examining the record that the Senator from Indiana had the floor and had yielded the floor to the Senator from Ohio to answer a question, and the Senator from Ohio was proceeding through the courtesy of the Senator from Indiana, which I am always very glad to give.

Mr. FORAKER. I know in what haste the Senator is to conclude his remarks, and therefore I shall not interrupt him further. I will at a later time, if it becomes absolutely important in the disposition of the question now before the Senate, make an investigation and try and get for the benefit of the Senate the information the Senator called for as to Virginia City and Tombstone and other places.

Mr. DUBOIS. Will the Senator from Indiana yield to me?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. DUBOIS. I merely suggest to the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Indiana that even if the mines give out they have accomplished their great object in building up splendid Commonwealths. California was peopled at first on account of the mines. So was Montana, and so was Idaho. In order to furnish the mining camps with provisions and supplies the lands were taken up. The mines have been the instruments to develop those great States, and it has been so in every mining part of the United States, with the sole exception of Nevada. So, if the mines give out the object has been accomplished of peopling those Territories. The mines are an insignificant part of every one of the so-called mining States and Territories.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho has very cleverly made my point. Why was it, I will ask the Senator, that the mines having brought the people to California they stayed there? It was because the richness of California's fields shamed in comparison the wealth of her mines. It was because there were fields there and it was because there was water there. Why, then, did not that same thing occur in Nevada, since the Senator makes Nevada an exception? It was because when the mines were worked out there was not a body of land sufficiently large with sufficient water for people to live on. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] said yesterday that there would be in the future, and I earnestly hope there will be, and I will vote, no matter how any person else in this Chamber votes, for any local measure that will improve that condition.

Now, the point made in reference to Arizona is that until the storage system is applied to those waters down there, until reservoirs are built, and catch-basins and great dams constructed which shall hold and conserve the waters and spread them for human uses over those fields, it does not make any difference how many mines they have, when the mines give out the people can not stay there, because there is no place to live upon.

The Senator from Idaho has stated what I was stating and all I was contending for, that the mines are in themselves a transient thing. That is not against the mines. The Senator admits it. He knows it because he has been in mining camps, and I myself have been in scores of mining camps. I have seen cities one year flourishing and filled with men and women who would become deadly enemies if anybody ever suggested that theirs would not be a city as permanent as eternity. The next year I have seen that town practically deserted, windows broken, doors torn off their hinges, walls falling to pieces, because the thing to keep the people there did not continue to keep them, because the mines had been worked out.

Mr. McCOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Pardon me just a minute, until I get to your question. I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio whether or not he thinks his quotation from Webster answered what he admitted was the pertinent inquiry of the Senator from Maryland as to the reason of this policy of rush. Is there anything about the condition of this bill in what Daniel Webster said a great many years ago that explains the reason why there should be an instant demand at all hazards, at the hazard of the death of all other legislation, that these Territories should come in, in the face of the fact that many Senators here of judgment, and I hope of conscience, think the contrary? Could any great injury be done even in case we were wrong—and certainly our judgment is entitled to the considerate respect of our colleagues? The measure is sought to be rushed through right now, and the Senator from Maryland asked what was the reason for the instantaneousness of this measure. Did the Senator from Ohio answer it in his quotation from Webster?

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly; always.

Mr. FORAKER. I did not rise for the purpose of answering the Senator from Maryland. That was too difficult a proposition.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Well, I agree.

Mr. FORAKER. That called for somebody who could do more than I was able to do. I had done all it was in my power to do to answer that proposition when I addressed the Senate formerly, and to the extent of some two or three hours. Therefore I announced when I arose that if the Senator from Indiana had made a sufficient answer and was ready to take up something else, I would read what Mr. Webster had said in respect to what the Senator from Indiana had been saying. I did not undertake to answer the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes.

Mr. DUBOIS. I will have the temerity to try to answer the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It will take more than temerity; it will take information.

Mr. DUBOIS. Does the Senator from Maryland want to lay down the rule that the minority should cease to obstruct and yield to the majority? The majority of this Chamber have shown conclusively that they want statehood for these Territories. The House of Representatives have passed the bill. Now, the minority, through the Senator from Maryland, contend that the majority are obstructing this legislation which the majority think necessary to pass. The majority are willing to set a time twenty or thirty days from now to vote. When that is done these obstructive tactics will cease; this constant flow of oratory will not continue to pour out. When the time is set by which the majority can have a vote, then you can pass your other legislation.

And I say to the Senator from Maryland that the majority will have a vote. They have always had a vote in this Chamber, and they will have it on this bill. You may bring in a trust bill, you may unite Arizona and New Mexico, you may endeavor to contrive to present something which will divide our forces, but there will be a vote, as there always is a vote when the majority want it, and the minority and not the majority are obstructing legislation.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. We see now how clear as a cloud is the answer of even the acute Senator from Idaho—whose vividness of intellect no man in this Chamber or any place else admires more than I do—to the question put by the Senator from Maryland. The Senator from Maryland asked what is the reason for the rush? What is the philosophy of this combustible instantaneousness? Give us the reason for it, says the Senator from Maryland.

Here is a great question which will forever affect this country—as the Senator from Idaho contends—for good. We hope for good, too, but we think it doubtful now, and we say let us pause and consider and debate this question. The Senator from Maryland says, "What is the reason for this mysterious"——

Mr. SPOONER. It is not mysterious.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Well, the Senator from Maryland said it was a mystery and the Senator from Wisconsin says it is not a mystery. So far as anything has appeared in argument it is mysterious, but I guess, in fact, it is not mysterious. I guess we all know.

Now, then, the Senator from Idaho leaps into the arena with an explanation of the mystery, and his explanation is, "We have a majority and we are going to have a vote." Well, that does not have even the merit of originality, because it has been stated on the floor——

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. Why, if there is a majority favoring this bill, should they not have a vote?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Who admits that there is a majority favoring this bill? If you will allow me, I will answer that right at this time.

Mr. FORAKER. I am not asking anybody to admit it, but the Senator's question assumed it, certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No, the Senator stated it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators must conduct this debate in order. The Senator from Ohio will proceed.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I submit I am undertaking to do so. The Senator from Indiana was answering something that had been said by the Senator from Idaho, and he was criticising the proposition that because there was a majority in favor of the statehood bill there should be a vote upon it. I am not asking the Senator to admit, but his criticism of the Senator from Idaho proceeded upon the idea that it was true, as claimed. Now, assuming that that is true, I want to know why that majority in this Chamber should not have a vote at some reasonable time in the future? Is this question one so difficult to comprehend that Senators can not discuss it and in reasonable time reach an intelligent conclusion?

Mr. President, every Senator here knows that this long protracted debate has no other purpose than that which has been asserted over and over again in the cloakrooms and in the lobbies and corridors of the Capitol, that this bill is to be talked to death. Everybody knows that that is the purpose of it, and the Senators who refuse to agree to a time to vote—ten days, twenty days, thirty days hence—and who insist that this bill shall hold the boards and shall receive constant attention until that time, they, I say, are the men who are obstructing the public business.

Nobody wants to continue debate but the other side. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] addressed this Chamber day after day consecutively for some six or seven days. That was his right. It was his privilege. Nobody took exception to it. Every day since others have addressed the Senate, one speech after another, and no exception has been taken to that.

But, Mr. President, if there is to be a charge about obstructing business, let the RECORD answer. Who is obstructing? I have been anxious all the while that the legitimate business of the Senate might be attended to; that a vote might be reached in the ordinary way and this bill be disposed of. I intend to vote for it, but whether my side prevails or fails, I think we owe it to ourselves as well as to the public business to agree to a vote at some reasonable time in the future, and then address ourselves to the public business, as we do when we consider other questions.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Has the Senator asked me his question?

Mr. FORAKER. I did. The question I asked was why a majority, if there be a majority, should not be allowed to vote?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, the Senator asks me a question, and thereupon proceeds to make a vigorous and earnest and extended argument, to which I listened with pleasure, as I always do whenever I can get to the Senate Chamber when the Senator from Ohio is talking. But he based his question upon a statement which is not correct—that I was criticising the position of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS].

What I was criticising was the answer the Senator from Idaho made to the very important question put by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS]. The Senator from Maryland asked, Why should there be such a lightning-like hurry about this thing; that he had not heard yet in any public statement. I told him I had not yet heard either. So the Senator from Idaho came in with his explanation. He said, "I will explain why," and his explanation was that they had the votes. I answered that by saying that, much as I admired the Senator from Idaho, that did not even have the virtue of originality, because I have heard it about sixteen or seventeen times before. That was the criticism I made upon the statement of the Senator from Idaho—that he had not answered the question of the Senator from Maryland.

I say I can not answer the question of the Senator from Maryland upon any of the discussions that have preceded. But now I want to say a word or two in answer to the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Idaho. They have avowed it in the statement about votes and the number of votes. The Senator from Idaho has just stated—I will ask him to look at his remarks in the RECORD—that they had them, and that they were going to proceed upon them, and that nothing could divide you. That was the word used. No matter how meritorious other legislation might be, no matter how instant might be the public need of it, no matter how great might be the country's emergency, so strong was this combination that the Senator from Idaho boldly asserted here that nothing could divide them.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Is not that so?

Mr. DUBOIS. Of course it is futile——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho is not in order. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly; as a matter of course.

Mr. DUBOIS. It is futile for anyone to undertake to follow the Senator from Indiana. The Senator from Idaho did not say anything approaching what he avers I said. I said there would be a vote some time; that you may try to divert us, and so forth. I did not say anything about not being divided.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from Idaho—and I appeal to the RECORD—said that we might put in the trust measures or some other kind of measures, but that it would be without avail, because, he says, "nothing can divide us." I appeal to the RECORD as to what the Senator said, and if I am wrong I shall be very glad to have the Senator correct me. If the Senator did not mean that, it is all right.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. DUBOIS. Now let us have the RECORD read in order to see how forgetful—I will put it—the Senator from Indiana is.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Very well.

Mr. DUBOIS. Let the Reporter read the remarks, and the Senator will see that I said nothing of the sort.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Let the remarks of the Senator be read.

Mr. DUBOIS. The Senator has tortured my expression. It was not done by design, but he fails to see the connection in what I was saying. Let the remarks be read.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The remarks of the Senator from Idaho I would be very glad to have read.

Mr. DUBOIS. Let that part of them be read.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If my remarks do the Senator injustice, he will have ample reparation. I call for the reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Reporter will read as requested.

The Reporter read as follows:

The majority are willing to set a time twenty or thirty days from now to vote. When that is done these obstructive tactics will cease; this constant flow of oratory will not continue to pour out. When the time is set by which the majority can have a vote, then you can pass your other legislation.

And I say to the Senator from Maryland that the majority will have a vote. They have always had a vote in this Chamber, and they will have it on this bill. You may bring in a trust bill, you may unite Arizona and New Mexico, you may endeavor to contrive to present something which will divide our forces, but there will be a vote, as there always is a vote when the majority want it, and the minority and not the majority are obstructing legislation.

Mr. DUBOIS. If any Senator can interpret that to mean that I said you can not divide this side, he certainly does not catch the meaning. I said you might attempt to divide us, my fear is that you will, but I insisted that we would have a vote, and that is all, because the majority always have a vote in this Chamber.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I was not incorrect, as it appears from the RECORD, in my recollection of what the Senator said, that there would be an attempt to "divide" his side. He then proceeded to say that they would have a vote because, he said, they had a majority. How could you have a majority if we "divided" your side?

Now, I am glad this incident has occurred, because it has led the Senator to express the fear that they might be divided. Mr. President, I sincerely hope, and I think that the Senator has good reason to believe, that there may be a division here. I am not at all certain that there are not several Senators who are listening and thinking about the earnest arguments that are being advanced here against the proposition, and to which at the beginning, at the last session, they were not expected to listen.

As to who is doing the real obstruction, the Senate and the country are informed. I am not going to go into that question. I was led into it the other day by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY], and the result was that we occupied the floor all afternoon, and there is no use in making a repetition of the statement which was there made. I appeal to the common understanding of the Senate. I appeal to the common——

Mr. QUAY. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. QUAY. The Senator from Pennsylvania did not occupy the floor during the entire time.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No; but the Senator from Pennsylvania——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania must address the Chair and get his permission. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Now that the Senator has made his remark, of course it will not be necessary to yield; but I am always glad to yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania, except upon the final outcome of this bill, in which I do not expect to yield, but will expect the Senator in turn to do me the courtesy of yielding.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania did not occupy the floor, but the Senator was the cause of the floor being occupied.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho says that the majority always have their way in this Chamber and that there has never been an instance to the contrary. If my reading serves me right there was a period when they were endeavoring to pass a tariff bill upon lines which had been agreed upon by the President of the United States and the majority in this Chamber, and the Senator from Pennsylvania succeeded in occupying the floor so successfully that he prevented the President of the United States and the majority in this Chamber from accomplishing what they desired.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. QUAY. I have no objection——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Always, and especially now, Mr. President, but not finally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. QUAY. I do not object at all, Mr. President, to the reflection cast upon me by the Senator from New York, but the facts were that the vote upon the final passage of that bill was not prevented and I was not able to prevent it. The bill passed, as the Senator from New York will remember——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. But with your amendment, however, accepted.

Mr. QUAY. With some slender amendment.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, with the modification accomplished for which the Senator had been for days and weeks addressing the Senate in order to convince their judgment that they should adopt it. That is to say, no business was conducted until the Senator had had his way in that instance.

I was not going into this question to-day. Once is enough. I would be very glad to go into it at any time, but I had not expected to address the Senate at all this morning, and I should not have done anything, except for interruptions, besides making two or three points I was making when the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] moved an adjournment yesterday afternoon. I am very glad, however, that this has occurred. Something good always springs out of the natural course of debate.

Mr. MCCOMAS rose.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I beg pardon; I hope the Senator from Maryland will permit me to conclude these remarks, because I have in mind what I want to say, and then I will hear the Senator.

I say that something good and fruitful always comes out of the natural course of debate. I shall not argue further at this time the responsibility for the holding up of legislation, which, as the late President McKinley would say, is an "immediate issue," because an immediate necessity, whereas this omnibus bill, at least, is not an immediate question. How can it be an immediate question? I see the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Idaho, who have engaged me this morning. They are not arrogant men at all. They are reasonable men, and therefore they would not mean to say that this is an immediate issue, simply because by a count of noses there is the judgment of some men massed up against the combined judgment of other men.

There are a large number of Senators in this Chamber, and I am not so sure that they are in the minority either, who, having given the subject the best study of which they are capable, and having addressed to it the best judgment of which they are capable, and having brought to it, as I have no doubt the Senator has, all of the public conscience of which they are capable, still differ with the Senator. Now, that being the case, an issue is formed for debate. That is why the Senate Chamber was put in the Capitol. That is why the Senate was injected into our scheme of government.

Now, with that very great difference of opinion upon the part of sincere men, does a mere count of noses, even conceding it might show a majority, make it an instantaneous question?

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator certainly concedes that this is a perfectly legitimate measure of legislation, and that in the natural and due course of legislation there ought some time, after a reasonable argument, to be a vote taken. The Senator has said that he does not know how this body stands with respect to this measure; that there may be a majority in favor of the bill which he is so vigorously opposing, but he thinks perhaps there is not. At any rate, he is quite sure that the debate has resulted in causing quite a number of Sentors who were disposed to vote for the statehood bill to waver in their support of it——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think some are almost converted.

Mr. FORAKER. And he seems to think some Senators are on the point of being converted to opposition to the bill. Does not the Senator think now that thirty days would be a long enough time for him to finish the conversion of these wavering Senators?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I shall not undertake alone the conversion, Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The conversation between the Senators must cease. Does the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. I wanted to ask another question.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I have called the attention of the Chair to the fact that the Senator from Indiana had the floor and yielded to the Senator from Ohio for the purpose of the Senator asking a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator will allow the Chair, he will say that when a Senator yields the floor generally he has it no longer.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. But I did not yield it generally, Mr. President. I yielded for a question. The Senator asked the question and then the Senator took the floor, as of right, though having it only by courtesy. I am perfectly willing to hear the Senator's answer, and I am willing at all times, even when having the floor, to address the Chair.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Will the Senator from Indiana yield to me for a time?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] frankly admits, and well he may, that he can not answer my question why, with only forty days remaining of this session, the present bill is pressed continuously, instantly, imperiously for disposition to the prejudice of all other public business. The very able Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] protested that the bill was being talked to death, and made many interesting observations, but in no wise answered or attempted to answer my sincere question. I am not one of those who have talked this bill to death.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] delighted me in his fashion of some one reproving sin. The Senator from Idaho discussed the ethics of Senatorial obstruction. He is a past master in that, and I accept his exposition, if he says anything in respect of the methods of obstruction in this body. I think the Senator from Idaho knows and has practiced them all.

Personally, I have not talked upon this bill, and I have been sitting here for many days, and yet the Senator from Idaho, who chides some alleged obstructionists and predicts consequences which, from his large experience in the tactics of obstruction, perhaps he understands far better than I, announces that there will be a vote, that some time there will be a vote, and that the forces will not be divided. I protest that the Senator from Idaho is not the last authority upon the predominance of sentiment in this body upon any public question. Each Senator has but his own vote; but still, the Senator from Idaho carefully avoided answering my question.

Now, are we to spend the forty days and forty nights remaining in discussing this bill to the exclusion, for instance, of the Cuban reciprocity treaty, now made public. Shall this bill delay action in the remaining forty days and forty nights, and every appropriation bill to support the Government be held up that we may discuss only this bill forty days and forty nights? Is the serious and important consideration of trust legislation to be excluded, and can it be that Senators would be glad to use this bill in the Senate as a mere buffer to preclude any consideration of important legislation on that subject?

There is here also a bill which I am trying to get an opportunity to urge upon the attention of this body—the bill is in respect to the eight-hour workday. I have been waiting here day after day to get some reasonable opportunity for that purpose, and I apprehend the Senator from Idaho will probably be with me on that proposition. He has not more interest than anybody else in these large concerns in which the public are eagerly waiting for us to pass upon in the brief time, which is speeding. Are we to be told that everything in which the people of the country have an interest is to be turned aside, and upon this question, which has waited for fifty-odd years, there can be no delay; that it must be this January and not next January; a question which has been passed by during all the Januaries of fifty-four years since Daniel Webster made the observation in the Thirtieth Congress which the Senator from Ohio just now read from his speech.

A man of very able intellect——

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President——

Mr. McCOMAS. Allow me to proceed for a while.

Mr. BURTON. Very well.

Mr. McCOMAS. A man of very clever and able intellect has written much about "the mistakes of Moses," but the verity and solemnity of the Pentateuch has not been weakened or in any wise lessened by that treatise on the mistakes of Moses. During this debate we have had frequent observations upon the mistakes of Daniel Webster. I listened with amazement just now to this last mistake of that great man, who will not be injured by the criticism even of the able Senator from Ohio, when he said, as he read it, that in the valleys of that country of Arizona there was not enough of valley and water to make in the course of years a large agricultural output.

I was thinking of the great State—small in population, but great in influence—of my friend from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] who is sitting here. I turned and asked him how the agriculture, that was $10,000,000 in value, of which the Senator from Ohio now vaunts as the great production of this to-be new State, compared with Vermont; and the answer of the Senator from Vermont who sat beside me was that in that State—a State with beautiful mountains, where there is not only pasture land, but immense mountains of granite—that total vaunted by the Senator from Ohio was not quite one-third of the product of the arable lands of the small State of Vermont, with all its great mountains taken away.

Instead of this being a mistake of Mr. Webster, I thought it was marvelous that Daniel Webster fifty-four years ago should have then predicted of this State, now 70,000 in population, that it would never grow great, and that now small in agriculture, it would never expand; and when only one-third of the agricultural product of Vermont after fifty-four years was to be made the basis to find fault with his forecast, and when the population had scarcely risen to 100,000 above the 70,000 then in the Territory.

The immigration bill is here to-day, for which I want a vote. I do not want to vote for the gates of Castle Garden to swing outward to all the disease, all the illiteracy, all the crime, and all the anarchy of the Old World. I would rather pass that bill in January and let these Territories grow in agriculture and grow in industries until next January, and then take up the statehood bill deliberately.

It will not do to say that this is not a serious question; it will not do to say that it will be pressed beyond all question unless the members of the Senate give some good reasons in the remaining forty days and forty nights why we should put aside all public business and pass this bill to the great detriment of the country, putting aside the serious business which we have, and which is pressing now in the appropriation bills, which must be passed; pressing now in the immigration bill, which must be disposed of in the interest of the country; pressing now in the Cuban treaty, which should not be delayed forty-eight hours; pressing now all along the line of material legislation.

I have stated these points, Mr. President; I have taken no time to debate this bill; but I wish some Senator would show me how and why it is that this is the only matter the American Senate ought to consider, and why it is the only matter in which the American people ought to be interested to the exclusion of the weightier subjects I mentioned.

I have a hope at some time to find some Senator who will explain why this bill should be disposed of and all else wait, and then only can public business of other kinds be taken up and be voted on by the Senate.

Mr. BURTON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I have the floor, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will yield to the Senator from Kansas, unless he is going to prolong the discussion on this point. I want to conclude what I have to say.

Mr. BURTON. I merely desire to ask a question.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BURTON. I did not quite get from the Senator from Maryland [Mr. McCOMAS] whether or not he was willing to have a vote on this bill at any time before the 4th of March.

Mr. McCOMAS. Personally I have no charge of this measure, and my answer to that question would not advance the desire of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BURTON], but personally I think when more important things have been voted upon I should be quite willing to use the remaining time of the Senate, if there be any, for the consideration of this bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Indiana yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly, I yield to the Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, in view of the fact that claims are being put forth here and assertions made as to the status and intentions of Senators, based on a vote that was had a couple of days ago, I think it is proper that I should make known, as one of the Senators who voted to continue the consideration of this bill, what my attitude is in regard to it.

I want to vote for the bill, but I do not want to vote for it in the form in which it now is; and I wish to explain briefly, if the Senator from Indiana will indulge me, just how I feel about it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will.

Mr. TILLMAN. The question has been asked here as to why there was such a necessity for urgency, why the bill was being pressed, and why everything else was shoved aside to give this bill the right of way. I am one of those old fogies who believe that a platform adopted by a political party in national conclave should mean what it says and say what it means.

Both parties as represented in this Chamber in their national platforms have announced themselves in favor of statehood for these Territories. Therefore if there was any faith to be put in their claims or the statement of policies upon which they went to the country, or if those platforms were made to get into office and then to be disavowed or trampled under foot, I for one, as a Democrat, protest that the Democratic party can not afford to occupy that attitude, and the Republicans are entitled to all the credit and honor, if they choose to assume it, that may come from such an attitude.

The situation, as I understand it, is simply this: There are in the Territory formerly called the Indian Territory—Oklahoma and the Indian Territory as they are now—something like eight or nine hundred thousand or a million white people who went into those Territories from the States to settle up and to create a new Commonwealth. Those people are our brethren. They are our fellow-citizens. They have some rights which both the Republican party and the Democratic party ought to respect. Their condition now is deplorable.

I happened to go down into that region the year before last, and I know something from personal observation of the situation. The people in Oklahoma are much better situated than the people of the Indian Territory—I mean the white people—for the reason that in Oklahoma there is some provision for free schools and for the machinery of government such as the States enjoy, whereas in the Indian Territory everything is tied up and hampered by the condition of the ownership of land by the Indians. The four or five hundred thousand white people there are, you might say, a sort of Ishmaelites. They are on Indian lands and can not get title. They are all clamorous for statehood in some form. The people in Oklahoma want statehood and the people in the Indian Territory certainly want statehood, either separately from Oklahoma or conjointly with it. If they can not obtain statehood then they want Territorial government the same as any other Territory.

There is a provision here in the statehood bill as it has been reported, as it passed the House of Representatives, and which, as it is claimed, has a majority of this Senate behind it, that to my mind is simply damnable in its cruelty and injustice. I will read it. After providing for the calling of a constitutional convention for the framing of the organic law, the apportionment of delegates, and all that kind of thing necessary for the birth of a new State, this omnibus statehood bill goes on, at the bottom of page 4, line 21, with a proviso to this effect:

Provided, That the constitutional convention provided for herein—

shall, by ordinance irrevocable, express the consent of the State of Oklahoma that Congress may at any time, or from time to time, attach all or any part of the Indian Territory to the State of Oklahoma after the title to said lands in said Indian Territory is extinguished in the tribes now claiming the same, and the same assigned in severalty and subject to taxation.

What does that proviso mean? It means that Oklahoma is to be created into a State with all the rights of statehood conditioned upon her accepting hereafter, in whole or in part, other lands now in the Indian Territory, and the population thereof. In other words, the provision of this bill puts it in the power of the politicians in this Chamber to take the arid or semiarid, the dry end of the former Indian Territory, great as are its resources and great as its capacity for maintaining a dense population, and create a State out of it; and ignore the claims and rights of the white men in the other end of the former Indian Territory or the present Indian Territory. That is the wet end, the rainy end, with land which is as rich in natural fertility as any land on this continent, and in some respects richer, not in fertility, but blessed in its climate, because I have seen land in both Oklahoma and the Indian Territory, and very large acres of it which, without fertilizers, will produce a bale of cotton to the acre, 20 bushels of wheat, 40 bushels of oats, 40 bushels of corn, and from two to three tons of alfalfa hay. Such a condition and climatic advantages do not exist anywhere else in this country of ours or in any part of the known world that I know of.

It is proposed, however, to create a State out of the poor and arid end, speaking relatively; then to ignore the rights of white people in the other end, parcel them out by piecemeal, and allow them to be "benevolently assimilated" as the political exigencies and opportunities may come around for a party to gain advantage at the expense of those citizens.

Consider for a moment this scheme of political brigandage and infamy. Are the white men of the Indian Territory of a different breed; are they inferior, that they should have no rights respected by this Congress? I do not consider that any man here will contend for any such doctrine as that. Yet here is your game; here is your programme: Instead of admitting the white people of the whole Indian Territory together, or creating two States, one of the Indian Territory and one of Oklahoma, or leaving the Indian Territory out entirely and creating a State of Oklahoma and let her go her way, you provide for something that has never been provided for before in our history, that this rich Territory, with its tax-paying power, shall be added to a State after it has been created and in such parcels as may be convenient.

You allow the arid end, Oklahoma, to locate the State capital, to locate all of the public institutions, the penitentiary, the State colleges, to get all of the benefits, and then you graciously admit hereafter these people in the other end to come in as wards in chancery, or as subjects to pay taxes. To support such a scheme is an outrage. Therefore, I never will vote for the statehood bill as it is now presented to us, and when people claim my vote, I want them to understand that it belongs to me, and I stand here as a representative of a State which believes in equality and justice and decent treatment of white people at least. [Laughter.]

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from South Carolina will bear me out when I say that, along the same lines upon which he has spoken, the report of the committee, of which I have the honor to be chairman, designated precisely what the Senator calls an outrage as "disgraceful." It is both an outrage and disgraceful. The Senator is right.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I did not finish saying that I wanted the people of Arizona to get statehood. I want the people of New Mexico to get statehood, and I am going to vote to give them statehood, as my party pledged itself to do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina is out of order.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina is recognized.

Mr. TILLMAN. I simply wanted to say that this one provision here is apart from my support of the omnibus bill, and I have tried to give the reason.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I understood his position as he has explained it, and I simply called the Senator's attention to the fact that so far does the committee agree with him—and I had almost said that is the position of many people belonging to our own party—that what the Senator designates to be an "outrage" we in our report say is "disgraceful." Democrat or Republican, or whatever party a man belongs to, it is an outrage to divide those two Territories, as the Senator has said.

I rose here this morning and asked the indulgence of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BURNHAM] to conclude, perhaps in five minutes, the remarks which I was about concluding when the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] yesterday afternoon moved for an adjournment; but numerous interruptions, always welcome, have kept this colloquy going on for a considerable time. I do not intend to take up any more time now, and I should not have occupied so much had not the circumstances been as they are.

I will, however, call attention to one fact, because I see the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] in the Chamber. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact to which I was calling his attention a moment ago, that there was an analogy between the mistake made by Webster and the mistake being made now by the committee, by saying that the committee have never said anything of the kind that Mr. Webster said. We have stated the opportunities that there are there for further agricultural development, and have stated that they are based upon the creation of a successful irrigation system. The Senator from Ohio will not deny that that statement is made, and that it is correct.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. The only thing that surprises me in connection with the remarks which the Senator is now making is that he should apparently assume that I could not understand him when he told me that once. I sat here and heard the Senator tell me all that, but why now, when he is in such great haste to make progress in the discussion of this bill, he should take the pains to state it to me again, I am at a loss to understand.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will try to explain it to the Senator.

Mr. FORAKER. Again?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes, if necessary to convince the Senator, I will accommodate him by explaining it any number of times, though this certainly is not to take time at this particular juncture, because I want to go away from the Chamber.

The comparison has been made with Webster, and I have pointed out to the Senator—and this makes, I think the Senator will say, the third time—that I made no such statement as Webster made.

Since the Senator made that point—and this is what I was coming to—I will point out to the Senator another analogy, which presents another side of the shield. It is that men have also often been mistaken by taking the mirage of their hopes for reality, and that might be the case with the Senator.

The Senator says that Webster was mistaken about New Mexico and Arizona, and therefore we may be mistaken about New Mexico. Well, I turn to the other side of the shield, and say many men have been mistaken about the prospects of Nevada, and therefore the Senator may be mistaken about the prospects of Arizona and New Mexico. I can point to reports—and I will hereafter read them at some time or other—made to the Senate by its committees and assuming to be made upon evidence containing statements most absurd in their extravagance. It is not for us to say that the Senators who made those statements here in formal reports were not entirely honest. Of course they were. They were simply mistaken; that is all. If a man may be mistaken in his poor view of the future of a section, also may he be mistaken in his too roseate view of the future of a section. So if the Senator's analogy is to be drawn upon us—and I have shown that it can not be—we can draw the other analogy upon the Senator.

It was stated that when Nevada came here to claim admission to the Union not only that she had 90,000 people and 40,000 voters, but that the prospects of her development were beyond the dreams of the most hopeful. Men believed that; they earnestly believed that; and upon their belief they made hazard of their fortunes. But they were mistaken, Mr. President; and so may it be possible that the Senator from Ohio is mistaken. I have called his attention to this merely to present the reverse of his analogy.

Mr. President, I shall not take up any more of the time of the Senator from New Hampshire. In all of this debate we are merely contending at the bottom and after all for the great fundamental principle of democratic government, to wit, that in determining the policies of the Republic it shall be the people who shall be represented, and not merely square miles that shall be represented.

I listened the other day to the almost mathematically accurate speech of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], so closely knit in reasoning, but I was sorry to see it inspired by a thing which I know to not be a part of the Senator's mental make-up. He divided the country into sections. If there is a nationalist in this body; if there is a man in this body who has the views that this Constitution covers the whole Republic, that it does not bind its hands, but nerves its arms and enlightens its brain, it is the Senator from North Dakota. Some of the most engaging conversations I have ever had with any person concerning nationality, concerning unity, concerning a Government of the people of the nation, was at the last session with the Senator from North Dakota. Yet the Senator in his speech here the other day based his whole carefully poised argument upon the proposition that really it was a Government, so far as the Senate is concerned, not by people but by sections. I was sorry to see that introduced into this debate.

One of the greatest hopes that has inspired us all for the last thirty or forty years is that the day and era of sections had passed forever, and not only that there should be no North and no South, but also that there should be no East and no West. Yet we had it asserted here that sections must be represented; that section shall balance section; that mountain States must be set against prairie States, Western States against Eastern States. It is a false argument—a terrible doctrine. There are no sections. There must be no sections. There shall be no sections. There is only one Republic, and that Republic is based not only on mountains and streams and fields, but, and chiefly, on the people. When you come to the bottom of this great question, the whole thing is the preservation of the fundamental principle upon which this Government, and all democratic governments, rests, to wit, the rule of the people, and not the rule of square miles.

I thank the Senator from New Hampshire very much for his courtesy.

Mr. DUBOIS. Will the Senator from New Hampshire pardon me? I will take but a few moments.

Mr. BURNHAM. Certainly.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, I am surprised at the line of argument of some Senators in this debate, and I desire to point out its unfairness. They constantly use Nevada as an illustration, and no other State. We are all aware of the fact that Nevada made no claims for statehood. A political exigency occurred at that time, and it was the desire of the dominant party and of the great majority of the other States that Nevada should be added to the Union. It did not come from the desire or the pressing of the people of Nevada.

During the fifteen years last passed there have been seven Territories admitted as States into the Union from this same region. I wish to call attention to the progress they have made. In 1890 North Dakota had 182,000 inhabitants; in 1900, 319,000. South Dakota had 328,000 in 1890; 401,000 in 1900. These are the recently admitted States. Montana had 132,000 in 1890; 243,000 in 1900. Idaho had 84,000 in 1890; 161,000 in 1900. Washington had 349,000 in 1890; 518,000 in 1900. Utah had 207,000 in 1890; 276,000 in 1900.

Now, in addition to that, look at the Territories. Arizona had but 59,000 in 1890, and 122,000 in 1900. New Mexico had 153,000 in 1890, and 195,000 in 1900. Even those Territories show the great increase of population which is shown by the Western States that have been admitted recently.

Is there a Senator on this floor who would want to take back the statehood which they gave to those Territories within the last ten or twelve years? Is there anything to which they find objection? When you give statehood to these Southern Territories they will increase much faster than they have done without it. An illustration comes to my mind in my own State. A few days ago a corporation put into bank $3,000,000 to reclaim 271,000 acres of land under the beneficent provisions of the so-called Carey Act passed by Congress. Capital comes in knowing it will have more security in a State. The reasons why that is true are numerous.

In a Territory, until a recent time, at any rate, the people did not know even who their officers would be: and in Territories—there has never been an exception to this statement, and there can not be—no one desires to go to the legislature. When they have their county conventions and have parceled out the offices which have emoluments, then they look around and ask, "Who will go to the legislature?" The office is not, as it is in the States, a stepping-stone to future political preferment. Business men will not go there and serve to get the per diem. The class of men in the legislatures in the Territories is much inferior to the class secured in the States.

But I rose chiefly to object that Senators should single out the State of Nevada in making the comparison.

Washington State has three Representatives in Congress, while Delaware has but one, and Delaware never can have more than one. New Hampshire and Vermont can have but two. Our States will have a million people in a few years. Then the proportion of our representation in Congress will not be fair compared with the smaller States of Rhode Island and Delaware and Vermont in the East. It is not just, and I protest against it, to compare Nevada with any of these Territories, although I agree with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] that there is yet a future for that country. But every one of the newly admitted States of the West shows a great increase of wealth and population, and the Territories now seeking admission show a steady increase in wealth and population.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. President——

Mr. MCCUMBER. Will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BURNHAM. With pleasure.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I notice that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] has just stepped out, but very briefly I wish to answer an allusion that was made with reference to the intendment of the argument which I made in the Senate some days ago.

If the Senator from Indiana arrived at the conclusion that the argument which I made in favor of the statehood bill tended to support the proposition that I believe in representation by sections, he certainly misunderstood the entire character of the address. On the contrary, the whole gist of the argument was to establish the fact that we should as near as possible, in the admission of new States, continually have in view the idea of the representation of population, and assuming that population is always dependent upon industries, that naturally in representing any industry according to its importance we are representing the population according to its importance.

I think I made it quite clear that the whole idea should be that it is the population and not the Territory that should be represented, and that in the present instance the industries of the country are not equitably represented in the Senate of the United States. That being so, and from the fact that they must remain substantially the same on account of the inability to change the representation, so that it will be greater than two Senators from each State, we should constantly and continually have in mind the balancing of the great industries of the country, so that each may have its just and appropriate representation. When we are doing that we are representing the people supported by any particular industry.

It is far from a reflection upon any Senator representing a State to say that in his representative capacity he looks particularly to the industries of his State, because that is his duty here. If one will look over the treaties that come before the Senate and see the influence of great industries upon them in the matter of considering what tariff should be levied upon any particular article, he will easily see the inability of some industries to make their voices sufficiently heard in the Senate, although their industries are important. I think that is the only conclusion the Senator could justly derive from the remarks I made the other day.

Mr. BURNHAM addressed the Senate in continuation of the speech begun by him on the 21st instant. After having spoken about two hours,

Mr. CARMACK. Will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BURNHAM. Certainly.

[Mr. BURNHAM's speech will be published entire after it shall have been concluded.]

J. V. WORLEY.

Mr. CARMACK. I wish to ask leave, if there be no objection, to call up a bill. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2974) for the relief of J. V. Worley.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to pay $40 to J. V. Worley, of Hardin County, Tenn., to reimburse him for a like sum wrongfully collected from him by the United States marshal for the eastern division of the western district of Tennessee, in the sixth judicial circuit thereof.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire whether he would not be willing to yield in order that I may make a motion to go into executive session?

Mr. BURNHAM. Certainly. I have not concluded and I shall desire to proceed at some time later. I will yield for the present.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator will occupy the floor, I suppose, at the next day's session. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After forty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, January 24, 1903, at 12 o'clock meridian.

PALMER G. PERCY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 14192) to correct the military record of Palmer G. Percy.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the charge of desertion now standing against Palmer G. Percy, late of Company H, Second New York Volunteer Cavalry, on the records of the War Department be, and the same is, removed, and the Secretary of War is hereby directed to issue to said Palmer G. Percy an honorable discharge, the same to date from July 24, 1864: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, why are certain cases omitted or skipped? Is it not in order to consider the cases just following the one last acted upon, for the relief of certain people? After passing the bill H. R. 14889 the Clerk omitted Senate bill 3546 and House bill 11544, to correct military records. Are they not in order for consideration?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the bill will be passed without prejudice until the Chair can examine it, and see whether it will come under the rule under which the committee is now acting, and it will be returned to if it is in order under the rule.

Mr. ADAMSON. Very well.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to address the committee briefly in reference to the bill just read by the Clerk, to remove the charge of desertion against Palmer G. Percy. I have the report of the committee on this bill, and have read it, and I feel so sure that if all the members of the committee now in session could read this report that this bill would be defeated; so sure that I want to state some facts which I have gathered myself from the reading of the report. I will address my remarks to this particular bill. I understand the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions made the point the other day that general discussion about these matters would be cut off by him by a point of order, and every speaker must address himself to the particular facts of the bill being considered by the House.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the report in this case shows that this man enlisted in the Army October 16, 1863, and he deserted from the service July 24, 1864. When the Pension Department was applied to for relief in this case I find that General Ainsworth indorsed upon the application, among other things, the following statement:

Application for removal of the charge of desertion resting against this man and for his honorable discharge stands denied on the ground that it has not been established that he was prevented from returning to his command and completing his enlistment contract by disability incurred in the line of duty, and because the case is not covered by any of the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 2, 1889, which is the only law in force governing the subject of removal of charges of desertion.

This report further shows that the beneficiary of this bill has before the Committee on Military Affairs as the only proof upon which he relies for relief sought by him his own affidavit. That affidavit states that in the month of July, 1864, being otherwise indefinite as to the date, he was detailed, with other troops then in the State of Louisiana, as an escort to accompany some officers who desired to attend church outside of the line. That he was placed upon picket duty, and while serving in that capacity was captured by the enemy and placed in prison.

He states that he was first placed in prison at Alexandria, La., and after remaining there some time he was transferred to prison at Shreveport, La. He does not bring here the statement of any member of the detail that went with him to escort these officers as to the truth of his statement. He does not bring any proof from the prison authorities that he was there confined. Bear in mind that he is stating that the confinement in these two prisons prevented him from returning to his command and serving out the term for which he enlisted. He offers that as an excuse and for the establishment of that excuse points us to his unsupported testimony, after having given a statement of facts which shows beyond peradventure, if his affidavit be true, that the proof could be obtained in any quantity from other sources to corroborate him. There must have been prison records at Alexandria, and he brings nothing from there. There must have been similar records at Shreveport, but he brings nothing from that source to corroborate his unsustained testimony; he simply relies on the uncorroborated statement of himself in the affidavit submitted to that committee.

The only other evidence that tends to justify the action of the committee was that some people in the community where the man lives now certify that he is a man of honesty and integrity. Why, Mr. Chairman, of all the proof on the face of the earth, as every practicing lawyer knows, the easiest is to find somebody, somewhere, that will certify to the good character of a man. I venture to say that Judas Iscariot could have found somebody in Judea who would have certified to his good character. He seems to have had somebody, because he was treasurer of the fund in the hands of the disciples. [Laughter.]

Now, that is the only testimony, and this report shows on its face that the man could have obtained other proof. If it showed that he could not obtain other proof, there would have been some reason why it was not produced before the committee and before the House; but he points out a state of facts that shows that all he had to do, if this representation is correct, was to reach out and get the proof and bring it here to satisfy this body.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have had time to examine this bill and have called attention to it. I have not tried to speak about the subject generally. I have not had time to go over all these bills, because there are 229 which have gone on the Calendar since the last pension day. There has been no opportunity for myself or anybody else to examine them all. These are the facts with reference to the bill now being considered, as disclosed by the report of the committee.

The bill itself—and I direct attention to that because I want to refer to another matter—the bill itself absolutely directs the Secretary of War to issue an honorable discharge to Palmer G. Percy. At the last session of this Congress the President of the United States vetoed a bill containing a similar provision upon the ground, if I remember correctly, that it did not simply authorize the Secretary of War to consider the case and remove the charge of desertion, but that it was a mandatory injunction upon him to do that act.

I can not but believe that other messages which have come into this body from the present President of the United States, and also from Mr. Cleveland when serving as President, are based upon the correct policy which ought to obtain in cases of this sort. In other words, I believe that this is an attempt on the part of Congress to exercise both executive and judicial functions which do not belong to this body. Where a man has been tried by a military court and convicted, to direct the head of the War Department absolutely to remove the charge of desertion against such man is an effort by this House to exercise, in the first place, judicial functions, and thereby reverse the findings of a constitutional court. Further, it is an attempt by this House to exercise executive functions, extending the pardoning power, which is not lodged here by the Constitution or the laws.

Now, I submit everyone will concede the proposition that neither of those things ought to be done, unless the case presents a clear, emphatic, and urgent reason for doing it; and this report does not present such a case, because this man comes here with his ex parte affidavit, referring to facts which, on his own showing, could have been corroborated if they were true.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I have no special interest in this case. I will say, however, to the committee that this man's character is very well established by reputable citizens in my district. I took up the case on the urgent solicitation of Mr. Carroll, a Democratic editor of my district, who is well acquainted with the proposed beneficiary of the bill.

I will say to my friend from Texas [Mr. RUSSELL] that this is the only case I have had from my district in which the Democratic party of the locality had been unanimously in favor of removing the charge of desertion. There is no difference of opinion among the Democratic party, in Dallas County, as to the justice of this man's claim for the removal of this charge. In addition to his Democratic neighbors, the clerk of the district court of Dallas County certifies to the good character of this man, having known him for twelve years.

I will say further to my friend from Texas that as a matter of fact it would be impossible for this man to hunt up the witnesses and bring forward the evidence that the gentleman requires, for the reason that this man was held as a prisoner by the Confederates, and he was so anxious to get away that when he escaped in the early part of 1865 he failed to take the addresses of Confederates there and request them to notify him when they happened to move from one part of the Confederacy to another.

There is no question as to the fact that when this man returned home the war was practically over. He escaped in the latter part of February, 1865. There is no doubt about the truth of the story that he was taken prisoner. There is no doubt about the fact that he was held as prisoner for quite a long time. He was not in a position to return to his regiment until, like a large number of other volunteer soldiers, he believed there was no necessity for returning, from the fact that active hostilities were practically over.

It is a matter of entire indifference to me as an individual whether this bill shall be voted up or voted down; but I do believe that this is a case where Congress can exercise its power without any violence to the general principle that a deserter is not entitled to much relief. In other words, I regard his desertion as rather technical than real—not a voluntary desertion.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Was there a court-martial in this case?

Mr. HULL. No, sir.

Mr. STEELE. He kept out of the way of any court-martial.

Mr. HULL. He was dropped from the rolls because he was captured and did not return; he was in the custody of the Confederates for quite a long time.

Mr. STEELE. He had a year in which to return to his regiment.

Mr. HULL. I regret that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] who made the report, in which he went into the details of the case much more at length than I can do, is not here to-day.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. When did this man first make his application to have his record amended?

Mr. HULL. Several years ago.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. How many years?

Mr. HULL. About six years.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. After his escape from prison, how much time had he in which to return?

Mr. HULL. I suppose he had from the latter part of February, 1865, to the close of the war. I do not know what time he got home.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Does the record show that he made any effort during that time to return to his regiment?

Mr. HULL. Not at all. He made no effort, by his own confession. I will say to the gentleman that he was not out of the way of a court-martial. He was in the custody of the Confederate troops. He was dropped from the rolls as absent without leave, and I simply want the committee to know the facts in the case. I am very sorry, as I said, that the gentleman from Wisconsin, who has gone into the subject very fully before making the report, is not here, and I confess that I have never given it very much attention, except to know that these parties who certified to the man's standing now, both Democrats and Republicans, are reputable citizens of my district, whom I thoroughly believe would not mislead or misrepresent. I regret exceedingly if this shall be voted down, because it is the only case that I know of where my Democratic constituents have been actively interested in having a measure of this kind passed.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I want to give the gentleman's committee the compliment of not passing on any measures, in my judgment, giving this relief, except those that are meritorious. I would like to ask him whether there is any hope of Congress extending to the Department the right to grant relief to many cases of general like character to this, so that it may not be continuously imposed upon Congress? With the gentleman's familiarity and knowledge of the subject, I think he can answer the question.

Mr. HULL. We have a general law now that gives the Department the right in many cases to correct these records, but it is impossible to cover all the individual cases.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But of the cases which are meritorious, such as the gentleman's committee is passing favorably upon, what hope is there that Congress may be relieved from this duty and burden by having a general law enacted covering such cases?

Mr. HULL. I will say to the gentleman that if he will introduce a bill giving plenary power to the Department to pass on all cases, I will gladly support it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But the gentleman has technical information on this subject, as his committee is well clothed with information, and I think that ought to be done.

Mr. HULL. Well, we tried to do that some six years ago, and did report a bill which is now on the statute books.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I do not mean to be placed in opposition to this bill, for I think it ought to pass.

Mr. HULL. As a matter of fact, it is impossible to cover all of the individual cases.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, I think that the law is as liberal now as it ought to be; that every man who is not a real deserter can go to the War Department to-day and get an honorable discharge; that this is a raw, bad case, and that thousands of men died rather than to make a record such as this man has made. They returned to their regiments when they were captured under great difficulties. They did not go home and stay there, as this man evidently did. I do not think this bill ought to pass. It is a reflection upon the honor and integrity of men who have died for their country, of men who served faithfully till the close of the war. I think the gentleman will agree with me that the present law is just as liberal as it ought to be.

Mr. HULL. In answer to the gentleman, I would say that if this man had been captured and escaped from confinement while the war was still in active progress, and had not made any effort to return to his regiment, I would agree with him that the man ought not to be relieved, but I want to say to him as a volunteer soldier—and he was a gallant volunteer soldier himself—he knows that after the war was practically over there was a general feeling among the volunteers that they ought to be mustered out and have the right to go home as soon as possible. This man escaped and never reached his home until at least the latter part of March, 1865. There was only one point in the Confederacy where attention was then concentrated, and that was between Sherman and Johnston; and as a matter of fact the war was practically over, and the feeling of the volunteers in the gentleman's regiment and in mine was that they enlisted only for the war, and whether they were in active service or escaping from confinement, when the war was over they wanted to go home and believed that they were entitled to go home. If this man had escaped in the latter part of 1864, when the fighting was the hottest, and not gone to his regiment, then no relief should have been granted him and the committee would not have reported in favor of giving him relief; but at the close of the war we have uniformly recognized that it was a different proposition.

Mr. STEELE. The law provided that after a certain date honorable discharges should be granted where they had gone home without waiting the formality of discharge.

Mr. HULL. Yes; and this man missed that by forty days, as I remember now.

Mr. STEELE. If he had waited until after pay day to desert, he would not have had to walk home. He would have got there sooner. He left his regiment in 1864, and if it took him until the following March to get home, it is evident that he had great difficulty in walking.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman's statement only makes it more clear to my mind that this is a good bill, because by our general law we provide that after a certain date in April every man who deserted can go to the Department and be relieved from the charge, and this man missed it by only a few days.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation?

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. STEELE and Mr. RUSSELL) there were—ayes 49, noes 22.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count to see if there is a quorum present. [After counting.] One hundred and five members, a quorum present. The bill is ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

THOMAS J. MORMAN.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will return to the bill which was formerly under consideration and passed temporarily, called up by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

The Chair will state that in this case there were two charges, one a charge of desertion, which is now on record in the War Department, upon which, however, the soldier was not convicted. Other charges were brought up which were modified in the trial, and hence the Chair will state that it might or might not be claimed that the bill was properly before the committee upon this day under the rule. However, unless there is objection, the Chair will direct the Clerk to report the bill. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STEELE. I should like to know what the bill proposes to do before consent is given for its consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for the information of the committee.

The bill (H. R. 11544) to correct the military record of Thomas J. Morman was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized to correct the military record of Thomas J. Morman, Capt. E. R. Goulding's company, Calhoun's Mounted Battalion Georgia Volunteers, Mexican war, and grant him an honorable discharge.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to consume any time if no gentleman is disposed to antagonize the bill; but if it will obviate an objection, I can make a brief statement which I think will satisfy anyone. If any gentleman desires it, I will make the statement, otherwise I will not say a word.

Mr. STEELE. I should like to hear something about it. If it is a case of desertion, I do not care whether it was in the Mexican war or the Revolutionary war, I want to know about it.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, with the consent of the committee, I will make a brief statement of the case.

Thomas J. Morman, a raw, ignorant, country youth, enlisted at the outset of the Mexican war and went with his command to Mexico. On the final march to the City of Mexico pay day came and there occurred some irregularities. A lieutenant sent Morman out to gather in supplies. At one of those little Mexican trading places he met another American. A row was precipitated during the trading and a Mexican was killed. The prisoner and the other man were both arrested, the prisoner in the meantime being reported by his captain as having deserted. Afterwards, however, when they were both arrested, they were tried, and the captain corrected his previous statement as to desertion. The other American was convicted of the charge of murdering the Mexican. The prisoner was acquitted on that charge, but on the contradictory testimony of a couple of Mexican witnesses, one of whom was in a field near by and the other of whom had been in the house, but ran out when the difficulty began, he was convicted of being accessory to the shooting.

The testimony of one or two of the witnesses was that they thought he furnished cartridges to the other American.

A few days after the conviction, and after he was put in prison, he was released by his superior officers, they say on the verbal order of General Twiggs. He went on in the service, and just before the surrender he was detailed to come home with a sick captain—Captain Hervey. The captain died, peace was made, and Morman was entered on the rolls as being discharged with his company at Vera Cruz; but the entry was likewise on the roll that he had once been reported as deserting and that he had been convicted before court-martial as accessory to murder. He went on home. As I stated, Captain Hervey died, the pay officer came around and paid him three months at home subsequent to that, and afterwards the captain and colonel both filed with the War Department affidavits and letters explaining the whole matter, to the effect that his conviction was found to be erroneous, that he was discharged by order of his superior officers, and was sent home with this captain and was marked "discharged with his company." There is also abundant evidence that both before and after the Mexican war this man always bore an unexceptionable character, and the statement of his captain and colonel is that with the exception of that one incident he was "a faithful and approved soldier."

He is now between 80 and 90 years of age, as I calculate, in feeble health, and is not long for the world. He thought that he was pardoned and discharged, and he went home believing that, and so did his captain and colonel. Now, Mr. Chairman, in view of the unsatisfactory and contradictory evidence against him, in view of his good character, in view of the fact that he had no counsel to aid him, being a young man and ignorant, and even not able to cross-examine the witnesses; in view of the clear, lucid, and satisfactory statement which he makes, which is the only clear statement in the case outside of the letter of his captain and colonel, I believe that the recommendation of the committee ought to be adopted. I hope there will be no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

By unanimous consent, leave for withdrawal of papers was granted as follows:

To Mr. NAPHEN, in the case of Leverett Bradley, Fifty-seventh Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

To Mr. GRIFFITH, in the case of Myron H. McMullen, Fifty-fifth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. FLANAGAN, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for five days, on account of death in his family.

PALMER G. PERCY.

The bill (H. R. 1419) to correct the military record of Palmer G. Percy (reported from the Committee of the Whole House with a favorable recommendation) was taken up.

Mr. HULL. I move the previous question on the bill to its passage.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I desire to be heard on this question.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is demanded by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I hope the previous question will not be ordered.

Mr. HULL. The bill was discussed enough in the Committee of the Whole. Let it now be voted up or down.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. It was not discussed to the satisfaction of either side. I do not care to occupy more than three or four minutes; but I do believe that this is the kind of a bill——

Mr. HULL. I insist on my demand.

Several MEMBERS. Let us vote it down.

The question being taken, the previous question was not ordered.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I desire very briefly to call the attention of the House to this bill and ask the Clerk to read from page 2 of the report the statement from the War Department and the statement of the soldier.

The Clerk read as follows:

RECORD AND PENSION OFFICE, WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, September 11, 1899.

SIR: Referring to your letter of the 7th instant, received this morning, in which you request to be furnished with a statement of the military record of Palmer G. Percy, formerly of Company H, Second New York Cavalry Volunteers, I have the honor to inform you that it is shown by the records that Palmer Percy was enrolled October 2, 1863, and mustered into service October 16, 1863, as a private in Company H, Second New York Cavalry Volunteers, to serve three years, and that he served faithfully until July 24, 1864, when he deserted. He did not return to his command, which remained in the service until November 8, 1865, or communicate his whereabouts or the cause of his absence to the military authorities.

Application for removal of the charge of desertion resting against this man and for his honorable discharge stands denied on the ground that it has not been established that he was prevented from returning to his command and completing his enlistment contract by disability incurred in the line of duty, and because the case is not covered by any of the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 2, 1889, which is the only law in force governing the subject of removal of charges of desertion.

Very respectfully,
F. C. AINSWORTH,
Chief Record and Pension Office.

Hon. J. A. T. HULL, M. C.,
Des Moines, Iowa.

STATE OF IOWA, County of Guthrie, ss:

I, Palmer G. Percy, a resident of Guthrie County, Iowa, with post-office address at Dexter, Iowa, on oath depose and say that on the 2d day of October, 1863, I was enlisted as a private in Company H, Second New York Volunteer Cavalry; that I served with my regiment until in the month of July, 1864. At that date the regiment was in camp at some point on the Mississippi River in the State of Louisiana.

While in camp at this point a detail of members of the regiment was made to act as escort for officers who desired to attend church services outside the lines. I was a member of the detail. At the church a picket line was thrown out, and Corpl. George Turner, of my company, and myself were detailed for reconnoitering services; that while engaged in said services we were surprised and captured by a squad of the enemy, and held as prisoners of war. I was confined in prison at Alexandria, La., about a month, and was then transferred to a prison at Shreveport, La., and was confined at this place until in the month of December, 1864. From Shreveport I was removed to some point in the State of Texas, and remained in that prison until the latter part of February, 1865, at which date I escaped from this prison. Being still within the enemy's lines, I made my way as best I could toward the north and arrived at Cairo, Ill., during the last days of April, 1865.

I had no knowledge of the whereabouts of my command, and the war being just at the close I did not rejoin the regiment or secure a discharge, being informed my military services would not be further needed. I had no knowledge of the fact that the charge of desertion had been entered against me until 1892. Corp. George Turner, who was captured at the time I was captured, is the only person who could give full corroboration of the facts recited. I made diligent efforts to ascertain his whereabouts and have been informed that he is dead.

PALMER G. PERCY.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 25th day of November, 1899.
[SEAL.] W. T. SHARP, Notary Public.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the records of the War Department, as made in 1864 and 1865, when these matters were all fresh and the members of this command were living, show that this soldier deserted July 24, 1864, and did not return to his command, which remained in service until November 8, 1865. What is there against that record? The record that has been made and which protects the great roll of honor is to be stricken down now. Why, and how? On the uncorroborated statement of the soldier, made after a lapse of nearly forty years. The soldier says nothing to corroborate his statement.

At that date the regiment was in camp at some point on the Mississippi River, in the State of Louisiana. While in camp at this point a detail of members of the regiment was made to act as escort for officers who desired to attend church services outside the lines. I was a member of the detail. At the church a picket line was thrown out, and Corpl. George Turner, of my company, and myself, were detailed for reconnoitering services; that while engaged in said services we were surprised and captured by a squad of the enemy and held as prisoners of war. I was confined in prison at Alexandria, La., about a month, and was then transferred to a prison at Shreveport, La., and was confined at this place until the month of December, 1864. From Shreveport I was removed to some point in the State of Texas, and remained in that prison until the latter part of February, 1865, at which date I escaped from this prison. Being still within the enemy's lines, I made my way as best I could toward the North, and arrived at Cairo, Ill., during the last days of April, 1865.

This is the statement of the soldier—a statement not corroborated by anyone—that he was outside the lines in July, 1864, and was taken prisoner there; that he was at Alexandria, La., about a month and at Shreveport for about another month. Now, I challenge any gentleman, be he a veteran of the war of 1861 or a resident of the State of Louisiana, to say that there was a prison at Alexandria, La., or at Shreveport. I telegraphed to the Department more than an hour ago for information, but have received no answer. Yet this man, who wants to strike down the record which has stood now for nearly forty years, says further:

From Shreveport I was removed to some point in the State of Texas and remained in that prison until the latter part of February, 1865.

The soldier says he was in prison in Texas somewhere for four months, but does not know where. Think of the statement! In a rebel prison for four months, but does not know where.

Forty years afterwards this man asks us to strike down the record because he was confined in a prison somewhere in Texas, he does not know where; he does not know its name; he does not know who were with him; he does not know anything save that he was released in the early part of 1865—six months before his regiment was mustered out of the service. He says he was unable to find their whereabouts, and that is his excuse for not reporting. This seems improbable. The rankest of all of the deserters of all of the wars we have ever had could make a similar statement.

Mr. Speaker, I believe there are instances where a soldier's record ought to be amended and the soldier granted an honorable discharge, but I do not believe this to be one of them. Here is the case of a man who eight months before his term of service ended, with his regiment still in the field, not mustered out, deserted, and let the record stand for thirty-eight years, and now, forty years afterwards, wants Congress to wipe out that record. Notwithstanding he claims to have been in prison, he never mentioned that fact to any of his neighbors. If some of his neighbors should come here by affidavit and testify to the fact of his coming home in 1865 and saying that he had been imprisoned, it would be at least a moral circumstance in his favor. He could at least show where his command was, and let the House see whether it was difficult to find. This statement seems so improbable that it rather weighs against the truth of his claim than to support it. It is a clear case of a faint-hearted soldier who thought it as honorable to desert as to remain with his command; and I do not believe this House will add its consent and give him an honorable discharge. In the name of the patriotic men who sacrificed so much, I protest.

So far as this record is concerned, upon which we are asked to strike down the record which protects this roll of honor and place thereon the names of men who were not faithful to the end of the war, there is not a single corroborating circumstance save the statement of the witness that he was in prison at a place—he does not know where—and finally went home and stayed until his regiment was mustered out, and did not know that he was charged with desertion. If this is not a confession of desertion I confess my reasoning is wrong. With what did he think he would be charged when he went home and did not offer for service or to be mustered out? Is it enough in this year 1903 that Congress shall go back and strike down the record by which this roll of honor of the heroes of 1861 is maintained and protected? I believe that roll ought to be maintained and to remain the great roll of honor that it is. I will concede that some on it had longer service than others, some more difficult service, some received greater wounds than others, more disabilities, but the patriotism is all alike. We should not lay our hands on it except for good cause shown and let in those of questioned patriotism.

Mr. Speaker, I want to register my vote against the passage of this bill. I want to register my protest against all such as this, and leave that great roll of honor in such shape that when we read down along the line it will be possible to say, "Here is a soldier whose service, long or short, was patriotic, and with him abided the love of country until the war was over; a soldier who never disobeyed a command, nor deserted and left his comrades, but with this one it was more convenient for him to go home to take his ease and leave his comrades to bear the burdens he assumed to share; but Congress added his name to this great roll of honor, and gave him a place along the side of those who sacrificed all, and for whom this roll was originally made." For one, not knowing anything except what appears in the report on this case, that being the statement of the soldier who states such facts as these, which condemn his cause, I am not prepared to add this name to the roll of honor and date it back to 1864. [Applause.]

Mr. CAPRON. Mr. Speaker, I would not like to yield place to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MIERS] as one who is trying his best to guard that roll of honor, of which he is so jealous. I would not like to forget, and I am surprised that the special pleading of the gentleman from Indiana seems to indicate that he has forgotten, that after forty years a man may not go out and obtain evidence and details, as to his whereabouts on this or that or the other occasion so long ago. I would like to state this case as it seems to me to be actually and not theoretically true. There is no doubt but that the man was detailed to attend church service outside the lines and that a guard of some 300 men marched 12 miles outside the lines. As they were in the enemy's country, they threw out pickets, and he and a corporal of his command were of these pickets who were captured by the enemy. Now, he states that he was taken to Shreveport, La., and to another place in Louisiana, and subsequently taken into Texas as a prisoner of war. He is not able to summon those Confederates who guarded him; he is not able to summon witnesses to prove what he said, because there are no witnesses obtainable; but what does he do?

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Indiana for a question?

Mr. CAPRON. Yes.

Mr. STEELE. I understand the gentleman to have information that this man has been prevented for forty years from obtaining the evidence that would make his record honorable?

Mr. CAPRON. Why, the man never had an idea that he had a disability standing against his name until a few years ago. He had no reason for ascertaining it.

Mr. STEELE. Did he not know that he had not received an honorable discharge?

Mr. CAPRON. I suppose if the gentleman or myself should be required to prove incidents connected with our service forty years ago——

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAPRON. Yes.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. He did know that he had not received a muster out from his company?

Mr. CAPRON. He did.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Why should he not expect that a charge of desertion would be entered against him?

Mr. CAPRON. Well, if he had been a lawyer or a member of Congress or a man who was hunting around for clients or had placed his case with somebody, I expect he would.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Or if he had been a faithful soldier he would.

Mr. CAPRON. But here is a man who came back from the war to civil life, and it seems to me it is not strange that the man went to work attending to his business, never thinking there was a charge against him. Now, I would like to go back to this soldier.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAPRON. Yes.

Mr. LACEY. The record is somewhat meager, and I understand that the gentleman is on the committee.

Mr. CAPRON. Yes.

Mr. LACEY. Perhaps he can tell us whether that soldier applied for his pay. Of course, when he was captured, his pay was going on, and there would be about a year's pay due him. Did he apply for that?

Mr. CAPRON. There is no evidence from the War Department that he did or did not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Would not that be of record if he had?

Mr. CAPRON. If he had applied for it or obtained it, I expect that fact would be of record, but it does not appear.

Mr. KLEBERG. In what engagement was he captured? Was he a member of Banks's army?

Mr. CAPRON. He was in the State of Mississippi with his command, and in the face of the enemy. He was detailed with a body of about 300 soldiers to go with a company who were permitted to go outside the lines to attend church 12 miles away from their lines, with the officers of the regiment and those who might wish to attend this church service.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. He belonged to the army of the Lord.

Mr. CAPRON. He was thrown out as a picket and was captured.

Mr. KLEBERG. And was carried to the State of Texas?

Mr. CAPRON. As a prisoner. It was a safe place for prisoners over in Texas.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. You say he was detailed with a squad of how many?

Mr. CAPRON. As I read it there were about 300.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. The record from his own reading is that himself and George Turner of his company were detailed for reconnoitering service, and while so engaged himself and George were captured, and he does not know the present whereabouts of George. Instead of 300 there were George and the other deserter.

Mr. CAPRON. I think he told the truth about George and himself. And now, if the gentleman will possess his soul in patience, I will read him something:

STATE OF NEW YORK, County of Washington, ss:

I, S. H. Parks, of Sandy Hill, N. Y., on oath depose and say that I was a member of Company A, Second New York Veteran Cavalry, and was in camp with my regiment at Morganza Bend, Louisiana, during the month of July, 1864, and later; that I remember that during the period the regiment was in camp at this place a detail of the regiment went outside the lines to attend church. I find in my diary kept at this time that July 17, 1864, 300 of us went 12 miles down the river to escort General Lawler to church.

SOLOMON H. PARKS.

Subscribed and sworn to this 20th day of November, 1899, by S. H. Parks, who is personally known to me.

[SEAL.] D. J. SULLIVAN, Notary Public.

That is my information upon that subject.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. That does not seem to be the same occurrence referred to by this witness.

Mr. CAPRON. He must have been a remarkably active attendant at church for a soldier, and you and I know we were not very much troubled with activity that way. I reckon it must have been the same occasion of attending church, because it happened to be on the same day of the week and month and year.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I have been informed, however, that some soldiers did attend church more than once in 1864.

Mr. CAPRON. Not from Indiana. [Laughter.] This man, after his transfer to Texas as a prisoner of war, escaped from the enemy and found his way by that slow and tedious method which a man is obliged to adopt when in the enemy's country, and arrived at length at Cairo, Ill., in the month of April, 1865. We do not need to recall what happened in the month of April, 1865. His command—not from the records, but knowing what happened to those commands in the State of Mississippi—were either a part of the army that went across to Savannah, and from there back to Washington and were mustered out, or they might have gone in some other direction. Some of those commands went finally to Texas as a part of our army of observation there against the then people in authority in Mexico.

He got back to Cairo, and the war was over, and he went home. And now there are as many as ten or a dozen reputable citizens of his community who state that he is a man of sterling integrity of character, that he is a man well known in the community and worthy of belief, and that he is not able to produce proof here of what happened inside of the rebel lines. We know that a man coming back from such imprisonment would be suffering from lack of food, from starvation, and from privation, such as happened to every man who was in those prisons, and that he would hardly have the energy to go looking around after his regiment after the war was over.

Just here I want to say that the Committee on Military Affairs has been very careful to exclude every man from the roll of honor who had not a right there, and this Calendar is a proof of the fact. With 2,000 bills now before that committee, every one referred to that committee by some member of this House, there are only two bills on the Calendar which we have had under consideration this morning. I consider that pretty good proof that the Committee on Military Affairs is doing its duty with the greatest care.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I should like to ask the gentleman if that does not sound to him a little like special pleading on his part?

Mr. CAPRON. No; it sounds like honestly stating the honest case of an old soldier.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question again.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, on a division (demanded by Mr. HULL) there were—ayes 56, noes 45.

Accordingly the bill was passed.

ALASKAN DELEGATE.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Speaker, pending my motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9865, I move that all general debate on that measure may be now closed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9865, the Alaskan Delegate bill; and pending that, moves that all general debate be closed now. The question is on agreeing to the motion to close general debate now.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will not insist on that motion. This is quite an important bill. No one has been heard in opposition with the exception of one member. I believe we ought to have at least some opportunity to be heard against the passage of this bill.

Mr. CUSHMAN. How much time does the gentleman suggest for general debate?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I think we ought to have at least an hour against the bill.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I suggest we have an hour's general debate, equally divided between those in favor of the measure and those opposed to it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that practically all the time consumed in the debate has been in the affirmative. I think we ought to have more than half an hour.

Mr. SULZER. You can have all the time you want under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HULL. A man is all broken up in that.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I will insist on the motion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Then, Mr. Speaker, I give notice that I shall demand the presence of a quorum on the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman to close general debate now.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I ask for a division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 62, noes 37.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the point of no quorum.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that for a moment and see if we can not get out of this deadlock. I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote just taken, and ask that general debate be closed in one hour.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. How divided?

Mr. PAYNE. Forty minutes in the negative and twenty minutes in the affirmative.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. That is not fair. They have already consumed an hour and a half. I want at least an hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that thirty minutes more have been consumed by those in the affirmative than by those in the negative.

Mr. PAYNE. I will modify the request—that debate be closed in an hour and a quarter, one hour in the negative and fifteen minutes in the affirmative of the proposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to reconsider the last vote, and that general debate be limited to an hour and fifteen minutes, fifteen minutes to be given to those in favor of the bill and an hour to those opposed to the bill. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The question is on the motion to go into Committee of the Whole. The Chair understands the gentleman from South Dakota to withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The Chair is correct.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Washington that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SMITH of Iowa in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9865, the Alaskan Delegate bill. Debate is limited to an hour and a quarter, one hour by those opposed to the bill and fifteen minutes by those in favor of the bill.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, it has occurred to me that before we pass upon a bill as important as the one now pending before this committee that we ought to at least consider the bill sufficiently to know something about what is in the measure. I find that in the first session of this Congress there was introduced into this House a bill (H. R. 9865) which was considered by the Committee on Territories and unanimously reported by that committee. I find, Mr. Chairman, that there was an order made in the House a few days ago to go into Committee of the Whole at a certain time to consider the bill H. R. 9865. When we got into Committee of the Whole we were presented with the bill H. R. 16653—a bill introduced in the House on January 13 of this year, just ten days ago.

That bill is materially different—in fact, it is practically another bill—from H. R. 9865. If the new bill (H. R. 16653) has been considered by any committee of this House, there is no report accompanying it. In fact, I am not at the present time advised that H. R. 16655, which we are called upon to consider, has ever had the consideration of any committee of the House. Possibly it has. I presume that it has, but it is a fact that no report accompanies that bill.

Mr. Chairman, in examining the bill (H. R. 8965) which was reported I found that it contained a great many objectionable features; but I find upon examining the other bill, which they propose to offer as a substitute, that it contains even more objectionable features than that bill.

Now, the distinguished gentleman from Washington made a very able and eloquent presentation of the needs of the people of the district of Alaska to have upon this floor some representation in Congress. I desire to compliment the gentleman for the able manner in which he presented his argument for the necessity for a Delegate, and I want to say at the outset that I am not here to oppose the representation from the district of Alaska of a Delegate upon this floor. I think, Mr. Chairman, that they are fairly entitled to it, and I think also that the House of Representatives is entitled to have some man upon the floor that can speak for the district of Alaska. So, upon the question of some person being here as a Delegate, if you choose to call him so, there is no difference between the gentleman from Washington and myself.

But the question is, Mr. Chairman, How are we going to obtain a Delegate from Alaska? How is Alaska going to be represented in this House? It is upon that question particularly that I wish to be heard. The gentleman from Washington makes the statement that in the Territory or district of Alaska there are 100,000 population. That statement, Mr. Chairman, is not sustained by the census taken in 1900, which gives the district of Alaska a population of about 63,000. Now, in the report accompanying H. R. 9865 they question the census and state that it is incorrect and that undoubtedly there are 100,000 people in that district. I want to read very briefly from that report. It says:

> When we consider the vast difficulty attendant upon the full and correct enumeration of population in thickly settled and more accessible districts, and how frequently the statement is made, even in large cities, that the census enumerators failed to properly enumerate and return a considerable per cent of the population, then how much more likely is it that in a district like Alaska, a vast expanse of territory with widely scattered towns, settlements, and mining camps, isolated and separated, without railroad and telegraph communications—how much more likely is it that where conditions like these exist the census enumeration has not been full and complete.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if for the reason stated in this report they can not get an enumeration of that district within something like 40,000 of the population, I ask you to tell me how they can hold an election where the conditions are as set forth in this report. A district, Mr. Chairman, absolutely without any of the machinery for holding elections that is in the States or in the Territories, and I say it sincerely—will some one tell me how they can have an election in a district where they say they can not take the census by reason of the conditions nearer than to come within 40,000 of what they claim the population is?

I find in the report that the principal thing asked for by the people of Alaska is that they want to be represented at Washington. I quote from the report, referring to the people of Alaska: "They want a man in Washington who knows us, our country and our business, to represent us and our interests." That it seems, Mr. Chairman, is the principal thing that the people of Alaska want. They want some one here that can represent them, and represent them on this floor.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, having been here about three years, and knowing the gentleman from Tennessee, I presume there is nothing to do but to submit, and I yield.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman need not submit to me that way.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Now, Mr. Chairman, this bill provides for the holding in the district of Alaska an election. It provides that the district which is divided into mining districts, the several districts, shall hold what they term a miners' meeting. At that miners' meeting certain things are to be done, and, among other things, voting precincts are to be established, and they are to name two judges of the election and, I think, two clerks. The bill says, "That all the persons within these districts who are or will be qualified to vote at the next election, shall be entitled to participate in said meeting. Said meeting shall be organized, etc." Now, Mr. Chairman, we find further on in the bill that in case these judges of election who have been selected fail to appear and qualify as an election board, then those present shall elect a board the same as we do in the States.

Now, I think it safe to say that where absolutely no provision is made whatever for paying election officers it is hardly likely that men who may be selected and appointed at miners' meetings will take the trouble to attend at the polling places, and attend all day and act in their capacity as judges of election, when they know they are not going to receive any compensation. But, Mr. Chairman, even if they do, I submit that under this bill it opens up the way to the best opportunity for ballot-box stuffing and for fraud that we have ever yet had presented to us.

But, Mr. Chairman, take, for instance, a remote mining camp, where the population is small. In such a locality a few men, or, indeed, one man, can gather up a lot of ballots and have them printed, and can make a return showing that in that precinct an election was held, and that so many votes were cast; he may make certificates in proper form and sign them with fictitious names and mail them to the governor of the district at Sitka.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. What does the gentleman understand by a mining camp as mentioned in this bill?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that a mining camp is limited by the number of inhabitants that there may be in the camp.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I will explain to the gentleman what I understand by a mining camp.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I shall be very glad to hear the gentleman's explanation.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. A certain section of territory where miners have commenced to work is, upon application to one of the judges of the United States, surveyed off and located as a mining camp; and a registrar is appointed in that camp who receives and registers the claims. That constitutes a mining camp or precinct. In a condition of that kind, how can the frauds of which the gentleman speaks be perpetrated? That is what constitutes a mining camp—a section of country which has been virtually organized, and which contains a place where claims can be recorded as deeds are recorded by a registrar of deeds.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Is it not true that a mining district is determined by the miners themselves?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. No, sir; it is determined by the authority of a judge of the United States court, as I understand.

Mr. CUSHMAN. If the gentleman will permit me, there are two ways of laying out a mining district in Alaska. Mining districts are nearly always laid out by the judge of the district, and a commissioner is appointed therein; but where a new "strike" is discovered and miners are there in any considerable number, they are permitted to lay out a mining district of their own and appoint a temporary recorder until the judge shall appoint a permanent resident commissioner.

Mr. LACEY. Allow me to make a suggestion. The State of California, as utterly unorganized as Alaska, held an election, completed its organization, and applied for admission into the Union, fully organized, on this sort of a basis, and no trouble resulted.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. A comparison of the State of California with the district of Alaska is certainly not appropriate or applicable.

Mr. LACEY. That was away back—fifty years ago.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Now, Mr. Chairman, whether or not the mining districts are created by the miners themselves or by a judge, as has been suggested, that has nothing whatever to do with the establishment of voting precincts within the several mining districts. If I understand this bill correctly, the miners at a miners' meeting held in the district are to organize such voting precincts, and they are given power, if they shall see fit, at any meeting duly called to create new precincts or change or modify the boundaries of the voting precincts. That is substantially the language of the bill.

Now, I submit again that in a district like Alaska, in dividing a mining district up into voting precincts, they will naturally locate those precincts wherever there are a considerable number of inhabitants or alleged inhabitants; and they may go to some remote part of the district and establish a precinct so far removed from the balance of the district that the general population will know nothing about the fact that there is to be an election at a certain time. A few persons, who may have evil designs, may get together and do the very thing that I have suggested.

These returns are to be made directly by the election board to the governor. He will receive those returns somewhere about the 1st to the 10th day of November. On the 10th day of November he is to canvass the returns and issue a certificate to the man who appears to have received the highest number of votes. After the 10th day of November any communication between the capital of the Territory and the remote parts of that Territory will be practically impossible. A Delegate certified as having been elected by the governor would come to Washington to take his seat in this House on the first Monday in December; but Congress would adjourn before there could be any investigation of any frauds which might have taken place in different parts of that district.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman permit another suggestion?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. LACEY. The very difficulty that the gentleman suggests was contemplated by the committee, and that committee provided for a fine of not less than $200 nor more than $1,000 to be imposed upon anyone perpetrating any such offense as the gentleman suggests, and the courts are open and there are no more law-abiding men than the miners of Alaska or the miners of the Black Hills, with whom the gentleman is familiar. They would enforce the laws. They would not tolerate any such thing as has been suggested.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, we have laws against stuffing ballot boxes, against frauds in elections, and yet we always do have frauds.

Mr. MANN. I would ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] if the courts in Alaska are any more open than they are in the United States.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I was about to suggest that and I accept the suggestion of the gentleman. I want to say that the man or the few men that might do the thing I have suggested could mail those returns and at the same time start to leave the district and go back to some of the States or possibly to some foreign country. They would undoubtedly use a fictitious name, and it never could be known who it was that perpetrated the fraud which might change the election in the district and by that fraud a Delegate would come here representing the district of Alaska.

Now, I say, admitting all that the gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN] has so ably stated about Alaska and its needs for a Delegate upon this floor, that he has not by this bill given Alaska a practicable and feasible means of selecting a Delegate. Another objection I have to the bill is to Alaska being designated as the Territory of Alaska. Alaska has always been known and is known to-day as the district of Alaska. The statement made by the gentleman from Washington that the Supreme Court of the United States designated it as the Territory of Alaska I do not think is substantiated by reference to that decision.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Would the gentleman like me to read it to him?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Not at present; I think that the decision refers to Alaska as territory belonging to the United States, but upon that question I am not certain. If I am incorrect the gentleman may correct me in his own time. Yesterday we had eloquence upon the possibilities of the district of Alaska. We were told that it has among other things great agricultural possibilities, that just as soon as the district is surveyed there will be settlements, people will go there to take up land and develop that Territory and make it rich in agriculture.

Mr. Chairman, if the district of Alaska makes the progress which has been prophesied upon this floor it will be only a short time before it will undoubtedly be divided up into separate Territories, and then, and not until then—unless there should be a Territorial form of government established for the whole district—can an election be held in that district, in my opinion, which will result in the honest expression of the people inhabiting the district. If I admit that the district of Alaska should have representation upon this floor, and am not in favor of that Delegate being elected in some manner, then it will probably be said that I ought to keep still or present some proposition by which the same result can be accomplished; and at this time I desire to present what I propose to offer as a substitute at the proper time for the pending bill, and I will send it to the desk and ask to have it read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That a Delegate to the House of Representatives of the United States from the district of Alaska, who shall be a citizen of the United States and an actual resident, for at least two years, of said district, shall be appointed by the President, and who shall discharge like duties and be entitled to the same rights, privileges, and emoluments as are discharged, exercised, and enjoyed by Delegates from the several Territories of the United States in the House of Representatives: Provided, however, That such Delegate shall only receive actual traveling expenses from his place of residence to Tacoma, in the State of Washington, and return; and that from there to the city of Washington he shall receive the usual mileage allowed Representatives in Congress.

SEC. 2. The term for which the Delegate shall be appointed shall be two years, beginning with the term of each Congress, and in case of a vacancy it shall be filled by appointment for the unexpired term.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the proposed amendment be again read, as it was difficult to hear it, especially the first portion of it.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be read again, but will come out of the time of the gentleman from South Dakota, if he does not object.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I have no objection.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit that the only possible objection that can be made to that proposition is that it is an innovation. It accomplishes all that the other bill seeks to accomplish. It does what this report says they are trying to do, viz, to give to some person on the floor of this House authority to be here and the privilege of the floor, and to be heard upon questions pertaining to Alaska. and to furnish the House with information upon proposed legislation affecting that district.

Now, I do not insist upon his being designated a Delegate. I do not insist that he shall have all of the privileges of a Delegate. I would be perfectly satisfied to have him termed a commissioner, and have him limited upon this floor with reference to privileges and restricted in some that Delegates now enjoy. But it answers, I say, the purpose for which this bill is offered, viz, to give the district of Alaska representation upon this floor, and to give to the House of Representatives an authorized representative from that district from whom the House can obtain information when it desires it upon questions which may be pending here concerning Alaska. There is certainly nothing unconstitutional about this proposition.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman submit to a question?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will ask him if he does not think the citizens of Alaska have the same right to select their Delegate on this floor that the citizens of the gentleman's district have to select their Representative here?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. In answer to that question, I will say yes, but I say that it is an absolute impossibility under this bill and under the conditions that prevail in the district of Alaska to elect a Delegate by any means whatever. That is my position. When a Territorial form of government is established in the district of Alaska, when they have some of the machinery so that an election can be held, then, I say, let them elect their Delegate the same as other districts.

And in the report on this bill, Mr. Chairman, it is stated that the whole matter is in the power of the House, and if the appointment of a Delegate is not satisfactory and does not work to the satisfaction of everybody, the House at any time it pleases can provide some other means by which a Delegate from that district may be chosen.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him another question?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not a fact that Congress must provide the means by which they can hold these elections, and is not this the only power on earth to whom they can appeal to give them the opportunity to hold elections, and should we not give it to them?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I have endeavored to make it clear that under the conditions as they exist in Alaska, under the conditions as they have been set forth in this report, under the conditions as they were explained by the several gentlemen who have spoken in favor of this bill yesterday, it is an absolute impossibility to hold anything like a fair election that will give the whole people of the district of Alaska a fair opportunity for an expression of their wishes. There is nothing in this bill that provides for a nomination. There is nothing in this bill that provides for official ballots or the distribution of ballots. It simply provides, as I have already stated, that polling places shall be established in the different parts of that district by miners' meetings and the appointment of judges and clerks of election.

No provision is made for paying the judges of election, and as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WARNER] stated yesterday, it is probably only the next move when we will hear from Alaska that an appropriation is demanded to pay the expenses of the election that will be held in that district under the terms of this bill, if it becomes a law.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit, in conclusion, that before we provide for a Delegate in Alaska we should consider the question seriously and fully, and not attempt to do it by bringing into this House a bill without the report of any committee, and endeavor, as an endeavor has been made, to railroad it through without practically any discussion of the question. [Applause.]

DELEGATE FROM ALASKA.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS].

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat surprised at the position taken by the gentleman who has just addressed the House. I had supposed that we were a government of the people, and that the Delegate should come from the people; that he should come here as a part of the legislative branch in one sense; that he should come here from the people not only to present what was wanted by them to this House, but also to make known what they wanted and was best for the Territory to the President of the United States; that to do this fearlessly he should be elected by them; that he should not be merely an appointee of the President to state or find out and communicate to his superior what the people of the Territory need. No such proposition as this, I believe, has ever before been presented to the American Congress. No Delegate thus selected has ever in our history assumed to represent a free American constituency. If they are to have a Delegate at all, in heaven's name let them select their representative.

All this talk about fraud is entirely unwarranted. It is mere surmise. I know something of miners. I know more of lumbermen. I have read what miners did years ago in California. I can not forget that they created that splendid State. I know this also, that the class of men who are engaged in mining or in our forest lumbering will perpetrate vastly less of fraud in an election of this kind than will be committed in any of our large cities. I believe you would get a substantially fair vote from these various precincts. At least, it is worth while to try it, and if there is complaint, if any such frauds occur as the gentleman conjures up, then the next Congress, when it meets, is amply competent to investigate and decide whether that Delegate shall have his seat or not.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Does the gentleman believe that a Delegate could be elected in Alaska who would properly represent the entire district of Alaska? Would he not rather represent the mining interest, or the particular section from which he came, having no knowledge outside of that particular district; and would it not be better, instead of having a Delegate here in Washington three-fourths of the time, to have a commercial agent, appointed by the President, to be in Alaska all the time, sending his monthly reports to the Secretary of State, accessible to this Congress?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Is the gentleman through?

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. The President has his agent there in the person of the governor of the Territory to do all these things you suggest. I can not say positively whether the Delegate, if elected, will have a knowledge of all or only of part of the wants of that Territory—much depends upon the man chosen—but admitting that it may be true as is contended by the gentleman, conceding that he has a knowledge of but part of the wants of all the Territory, which I do not believe will be the case, it is even then desirable that some one should be here able to represent them in part, as a move in the right direction.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Does not the gentleman know that there is no permanency in the inhabitants of Alaska: that they are there simply for a time, temporarily, to struggle for wealth; that they return to their States and vote there; that they have no permanent interests in Alaska, and do not deserve representation upon this floor; that they are a fugitive lot—there to-day and away to-morrow?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I have no doubt that there are many men in Alaska who may intend to return to the States or their homes. I believe, also, that when one returns two more will go there and take his place. But I am confident, from listening to the testimony of men who are residents of Alaska and who have lived there many years, that Alaska has possibilities both of agriculture and of mining that we do not yet fully comprehend, and that right and justice demand that they should send a Delegate here; and I also know that the output of Alaska to-day goes up into the millions, many of them. I know, further, from the testimony which came before the committee of which I have the honor to be a member, that the fishing interest of Alaska is one of the greatest fishing interests on the continent of America. There are men living there that have been living there for many years, having large sums invested in fishing and other business, men of character and business ability, whose homes are there and will continue to be there, and while there is such a population in Alaska, in order that we may have proper legislation at all, they should have an opportunity to send some one to make their wants known.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield? It was suggested that the fishing interests were not given an opportunity to vote in that election.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. They have an opportunity of voting under this bill.

Mr. MANN. It was suggested that they had no polling places.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. There are polling places in the towns, and the fishing interests are largely centered in towns.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Does not the gentleman know that it is impossible to get fishermen to go to an election, because if they do they can not catch fish?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I know something about fishermen, as there are, I think, nearly as many in my State as any State in the Union. I believe they can vote intelligently and that they do.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago the gentleman from South Dakota was laboring very much in a magnificent state of ignorance as to the population of Alaska. He lives upon the extreme western portion of this country and in a State that has long remained a Territory in this country.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I do not desire to be interrupted by the gentleman. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. A parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I do not submit to a parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman can not interrupt me with a parliamentary inquiry. He is just about as ignorant of parliamentary law as about some other things that I will show.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman can not take me off the floor——

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I make this point—that the gentleman from Tennessee is out of order. He was not recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I did not yield him any time, and the gentleman in control of the balance of the time certainly has not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota failed to reserve his time, as the Chair understands it, and took his seat.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I supposed that under the order that was made that was not necessary.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman is displaying ignorance about that in the same charming quality. The gentleman, though he has been in Congress for several years, does not know how to reserve his time.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit that the gentleman from Washington corroborates me in the belief that when the order was made in the House I was to control one hour of the time and he was to control fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota was recognized for an hour; and if he had reserved his time, the Chair would have reserved it. The order made in the House was that one hour be under the control of the opponents of the measure and fifteen minutes under the control of the supporters of the measure, but no arrangement was made as to who should dispose of the time.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I submit to the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. MANN. I submit the order of the House was that one hour of time for general debate should be given to those in opposition to the bill and fifteen minutes to those in favor of the bill. I desire to ask whether the gentleman from Tennessee is recognized to speak in opposition to the bill or in favor of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee was recognized in pursuance of his representation that he was in opposition to the bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I submit that I am not to be taken off the floor in this way.

Mr. MANN. If he is speaking in opposition to the bill he can take the remainder of the hour.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will proceed with my remarks. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE], pleading ignorance to the House and to the country, was ungracious enough to repel a mere interruption, a parliamentary interruption, to give him the very information which he showed he did not have, and which I think has not been given to this time. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I have before me a very carefully compiled table by the Census Bureau.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. I wish to ask if the gentleman from Tennessee can occupy the balance of the hour to the exclusion of other members who wish to oppose the bill?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I do not want my time taken up by these points of order, which amount to nothing.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will announce that the gentleman who has the floor can not be removed from the floor by parliamentary inquiries. The gentleman from Tennessee will proceed.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman will save time if he will let me alone, and he will get information, too, and so would the gentleman from South Dakota. It is an easy matter to give him information. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire in all seriousness to read from this official table. The population "21 years of age and over" in Alaska was 48,550 in 1900; "white" population, 25,953; "negro" population, 141; "other colored population," 11,862; "native born," 26,489.

Mr. Chairman, to show you how unfairly the position of the distinguished gentleman from South Dakota has been, when South Dakota and North Dakota were admitted as States into this Union, according to the report on the bill, they had the measly "population" of 2,576, as shown by page 4 of this report, while here are 38,000 men "21 years old and upward" whom we propose to make by this bill legalized voters of the Territory of Alaska. Again, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. I submit that the gentleman from Tennessee is not talking in opposition to the bill. Under agreement of the House he is not entitled to the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order will be sustained unless the gentleman speaks in opposition to the bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If the gentleman will be patient a few moments, I will get to the opposing part of my speech. [Laughter.] There is so much ignorance displayed on that side that it takes about all of my time to keep the members enlightened. [Renewed laughter.]

Why, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman even says that Alaska is a "district," and hoots at the idea that Alaska is otherwise than a district; that it is not a Territory, and yet I have here an opinion of the Supreme Court, delivered in 1895, reported in 163 U. S., page 352, by Judge Harlan, that great jurist, in which he said that "Alaska is one of the Territories of the United States." "It was so designated in that order, and has always been so regarded," and he quotes from numerous statutes of the United States where it has been denominated the "Territory of Alaska," spelled with a big T.

But suppose it is a "district." That is nothing. The District of Columbia was formerly a "Territory" and was first alluded to not as a district, but as the "Territory of Columbia."

Now, then, Mr. Chairman, so much of information I trust I may have given to my colleagues on this side, and I am absolutely sure I have given the gentleman from South Dakota some information if he is capable of taking it in. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, we will get down to some of the provisions of the bill to which I do object; but rather, Mr. Chairman, than rob these people of having an honest representative here, elected by the people of Alaska, I will swallow the whole bill. I do not believe in colonialism or imperialism, but if William J. Bryan or Andrew Jackson or George Washington were President of the United States to-day I would not agree that either of them, as President of the United States, should appoint any man to come down here and represent the Territory of Alaska. I believe in the people having a man of their own selection here to represent them, and I believe if men have interest enough to go into the bowels of the earth in that cold country to make a living they can find a man honest enough to come here and represent them, the people of that country who have been so long misrepresented in this House, who ought to have representation. [Applause.]

Now, what else, Mr. Chairman? It has got so that we appoint judges to Alaska and we start them out honest enough, but before they have been there on the woolsack for three months they are rotten and corrupt. And yet the gentleman from North Dakota, I believe, would leave it to one of the judges to appoint a man to come down here and represent those people who have risked their lives and their fortunes in mining, fishing, and in agriculture. Mr. Chairman, one man may be corrupt, but he can not corrupt all the people. You may fool a part of the people part of the time, but you can not fool all the people all the time.

I believe in the honesty of the great majority of this people, and I believe there are enough honest people in Alaska for them to get together in their mining precincts or in their municipalities and other places and send a representative down here whose brain is not clouded and who at least in this great Congress would be courteous to his fellows.

Now, let us get down to this question of election precincts. The voter must be "able to read and write the English language or some other European language." Now, Mr. Chairman, I say I support that provision rather than defeat the bill; I will support the whole bill rather than be a party to defeating it. But I say, Mr. Chairman, that the reason——

Mr. MANN. I submit that the gentleman, according to his own statement, is not in opposition to the bill, and therefore is not entitled to the floor.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to amend the bill. I have an amendment written out——

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SMITH of Iowa). The gentleman from Tennessee was recognized by the Chair upon his statement that he was in opposition to the bill. Upon the statement that the gentleman has just made, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WARNER] will be recognized in opposition to the bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What did I understand the Chair to say?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Tennessee upon his statement that he was in opposition to the bill——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am opposed to it in its present form.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has stated on the floor that he wishes to amend the bill, but will vote for it and support it rather than see the legislation fail.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is exactly right, and I believe I am entitled to the floor. However, yielding to the wisdom of the Chair, I yield the floor, though I desire to speak to my amendments, but will support the bill horse, foot, and dragoon rather than defeat it.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Chairman, while I favor a Delegate for the district of Alaska, I am opposed to the methods provided by this bill for selecting that Delegate. I suggested that the Delegate be appointed by the President or the governor of that district. For the first time in my life I have heard it charged by a reputable gentleman that an appointee of the President of the United States is the slave of that President, that the President is his master, and that he can not be relied upon to give his fair and honest judgment upon anything that may come within his knowledge.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I rise to a point of order. I should like to know whether the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WARNER] is going to support this bill on the final vote?

Mr. WARNER. I am going to vote against it from top to bottom. [Laughter and applause.] My objection to the method prescribed in the bill for selecting a Delegate is that you can not get an expression of the will of the people of the district of Alaska by the machinery proposed to be provided. The weakness of the system is acknowledged by the frame of the bill itself. It does not prescribe or provide for any primary convention or anything of the kind for making a nomination for Delegate. There is not to be any nomination in the district. No parties are to be recognized. It is a game of "catch as catch can and every fellow for himself," a "free for all." Every mining district in the Territory can have its candidate. Each mining district can vote for any man it pleases, making as many votes for that candidate as it possibly can. There is no responsibility upon anyone.

We all know what the mining districts are and what kind of population they have. While they are as honorable men as any in the world, yet they want to carry their point, and they are for their partners right along. A thousand men or more may occupy one of those camps to-day and to-morrow it will be deserted. Those men are migratory; none of them are permanent residents. They are there for the purpose of making money. They have gone to that country from the States, and their habitual declaration is that "as soon as they get stuff enough they will return to God's country." They have their own personal interest at stake, and we do not blame them.

Now, there may not be a single person nominated for any office except by his mining district. No party will be represented. In all probability at each election there will be 20 persons voted for in Alaska for Delegate to Congress. The returns will be sent to the governor of the district, certified by men of whom he has never heard; he will not know whether they are judges of election or not, except by what they state. They will not have been appointed by him or anybody known to him.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I do not like to interrupt the gentleman; but he makes an accidental misstatement. The provision of the bill is that when the judges and clerks of election are appointed, that fact, among other things, shall be certified to the governor.

Mr. WARNER. Of course, the gentleman from Washington and myself, and half a dozen others may occupy a deserted mining district; may hold an election; may make out our own certificates, certifying whom we voted for, and how many ballots were cast; and we may send that certificate of returns to the governor; and that may be the first notice the governor will have that any election has been held there. Every mining district will have its own candidate. It will vote for him and send the returns down to the governor, and every district will want to have more votes than any of the others. If this bill passes and becomes a law it will come back to trouble us.

We will have more contested-election cases from the district of Alaska than from any State in the Union. I think it is unwise and should not be adopted. I am opposed to it for that reason, and I think it perfectly safe to let the President appoint a Delegate or a commercial agent to come down here and represent those people. I do not believe an election can be held up there unless the judges of election are paid for their time and for their services, and unless the advertising, registration, etc., are also paid for, and this bill professedly does not provide for anything of that kind.

Another thing, the returns from northern Alaska can not possibly reach the governor at Sitka or Juneau—Sitka being the present seat of government and Juneau the prospective seat of government—by the time he must make his certificate. Navigation closes on the Yukon on the 20th of September, before these elections are to be held. It is a frozen country from that time until the following June. These returns would have to be carried down from 1,000 to 2,000 miles, by mail or in some way, coming from the north, and 1,500 miles coming from the west.

The whole thing would be a farce, and a roaring one at that. I believe that it is unwise to pass this bill. We have sympathy with those people up there. They should be represented, but let us have them represented in an orderly way; let us have a representative sent down here from there, appointed by the President from among their number, one who will give his undivided time and attention to the interests of the district of Alaska and matters of investigation, and who will report here to Congress and have a place on this floor.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I would like to ask the gentleman if there has ever been a time in the history of this Government when the President of the United States has been permitted to commission a man into the legislative branch of the Government?

Mr. WARNER. I have never heard of anything of the kind; but that does not make any difference. It is the first time it has ever been proposed that a district should be represented on this floor in any way.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Is it not, in fact, foreign to the purpose and object of this government that the Executive should be permitted to stuff the legislative halls with delegates?

Mr. WARNER. The trouble is that he will not "stuff" the legislative branches of this Government. The Delegate will be here simply to give information, the same as do the Attorney-General and every member of the Cabinet. We who are on the Committee on the Judiciary apply to the Attorney-General every day for information, and other gentlemen apply to the Secretary of War and to the Secretary of the Navy. That is done by mail. They might just as well be on this floor and give the information by word of mouth. The appointment of this Delegate would not "stuff the legislative halls." He will not increase the size of this body so far as its power is concerned; he can not cast a vote.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. He is on the roll.

Mr. WARNER. And so is the Clerk and the Sergeant-at-Arms and other people, but he is simply here for the purpose of advising us—giving us information. He can not vote in this body or in committee, except by courtesy of the committee.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WARNER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I would ask whether it is not the practice of every committee of this House to send almost every bill which comes before it and is taken up for consideration to one of the executive branches of the Government to obtain information in respect to the subject-matter of the bill?

Mr. WARNER. Certainly.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. But that is authorized by the Constitution.

Mr. MANN. There is nothing in the Constitution about it. What is the use of saying that?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. That is provided for in the Constitution—that the Executive shall advise Congress from time to time.

Mr. MANN. Not at all. That is an Executive message. That comes to Congress at the beginning of the session.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. That is his duty.

Mr. MANN. And has nothing to do with the Constitution.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. That is an Executive duty, and these heads of departments are his appointees.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Chairman, I can not waive any more of my time until I get through.

Mr. MANN. The annual message has nothing to do with Congress asking for information from a department of the Government.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. It is his duty. He shall do it from time to time.

Mr. WARNER. There is infinitely more necessity for a Delegate on this floor from the District of Columbia than there is from the district of Alaska.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH] stated that the Delegates were on the roll. I read from page 471 of the Digest:

It has been held that there is no roll of Delegates which the Speaker is obliged to recognize at the time of swearing in members-elect at the organization of the House.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. That is very true, but I think the gentleman ought to change his designation. Much as I like Missouri, I do not hail from there.

Mr. MANN. Well, it would be a great compliment to Missouri if the gentleman did.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. There is one question I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. WARNER. He has not the floor now. Mr. Chairman, the population of Alaska—all the population there that are worth anything—are the mining population and the people who supply them, the merchants and traders and manufacturers, and so forth, at the principal towns. If it were not for the mining interest in Alaska, if it were not for the minerals that can be found there, there would not be a thousand white men in Alaska to-day; and if those minerals are ever exhausted that will be the end of the white race in Alaska.

Sitka is not one-fifth the size that it was seventy years ago. The Russians had Sitka and had that territory then, and Sitka was a great place. It had foundries and manufactories. It built ships and was a great city. They tried to develop the country. They tried to make it an agricultural country, and they absolutely failed. Talk about its being an agricultural country, it is not and never can be. The Russians made a dead failure of it. Thirteen years ago, when I first visited Alaska, there was only one four-footed domestic animal in the whole district, and that was a donkey at Juneau.

The Russians imported cattle and horses and tried to keep them there, but could not do it, and the United States Government has spent several hundred thousand dollars in introducing reindeer into Alaska, because cattle could not live there. There is not a garden in Alaska, except on the western slope, where the Japan current and winds come in and keep an equable temperature.

Outside the western coast, over in the interior, the ground is frozen for several feet under the surface. It freezes up in September and thaws out again a little in June and July, and they have frosts all during the summer; and it is utter nonsense to talk about agriculture in Alaska. It is valuable for mining, furs, and fishing, and nothing else, and that is all it ever will be. Give them a Delegate, but in a manner that will not be too expensive for the Government and will not make us trouble in the future. There should be no objection to that. But if we adopt this bill and make it a law, we will have a merry time in settling contested-election cases from 20 or 30 mining districts in Alaska every two years.

I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Chairman, how much time is remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Twelve minutes.

Mr. CUSHMAN. How much time is remaining for those in opposition to the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. There is no time remaining to the opposition.

Mr. CUSHMAN. And twelve minutes for those in support of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Chairman, in rising to close the debate on this bill, I realize that it will be impossible for me, in the few minutes' time remaining, to cover all the points raised by the opponents of this bill. Permit me to say that I have been somewhat surprised at the opposition that this bill seems to have created. Yet I assume that those who have spoken against the bill are as candid in their opposition to it as I am earnest in my support of the same.

Now, then, I think there are one or two propositions which, briefly stated by me, will clear away some of the misunderstanding that seems to exist regarding this bill.

The map which I had on this floor yesterday had traced thereon the outlines of the existing mining districts in Alaska, and that map likewise disclosed that these mining districts, which are legal subdivisions of Alaska and the boundaries of which are well known, not only include within their boundaries the chief mineral locations and the great majority of the mining population, but these same mining districts also include within their boundaries the chief places in Alaska where the fishing industry and other industries are prosecuted. In other words, the mining districts which are now created in Alaska contain within their limits 95 per cent of the voting population of Alaska, and the machinery of this bill is sufficient to guarantee a fair election in each of these mining districts.

Now, then, the statement has been made here that it will be difficult for this vast Territory to be represented.

It is not the Territory that is represented. It is the people in the Territory who are to be represented. Nobody claims that the State of Texas ought to forfeit any of her right to representation on this floor because, forsooth, there are vast stretches of territory in that State that are not inhabited. We are seeking here a Delegate to represent the people of Alaska.

Now, in regard to the present population of Alaska. We have claimed and now claim in this debate that the Territory of Alaska contains 100,000 population. Two years and a half ago the census was taken. This was the first census ever taken in Alaska. That census gave them 63,592 people, I believe. Two years and a half have elapsed since then, and during all of this time through the cities of my State that constitute the gateways to this great region there has flowed a mighty and resistless wave of humanity toward Alaska. There are about 40 steamers, many of which run the year round, plying on the waters of Puget Sound and to Alaska. Every one of them is loaded with men going to Alaska. It is not unreasonable to suppose that the population of Alaska has in the meantime increased to 100,000.

We all know that every time the census is taken how difficult it is to take the full enumeration, even in a thickly populated settlement.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. And nobody is satisfied with it, anyway.

Mr. CUSHMAN. That is right. Whenever the census is taken there is a continual row in the cities and villages claiming that their enumeration was not large enough. How much more strongly can we indulge the supposition that the few men detailed to take the census of that great region, Alaska, did not secure anywhere near a full enumeration? So much for the population of the Territory.

Now, then, with regard to the possibility of fraud in the election or the election returns. We have endeavored to guard against that in this bill as well as it can be guarded against in any locality populated by any kind of people. I will say, as was stated by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] on this floor, that the people of Alaska are law-abiding. God knows if they hadn't been there would have long ago been a revolution in that region founded on the time-honored proposition of "taxation without representation."

Of course they are law-abiding people in Alaska, as was shown by their toleration during the days of trouble with the judge at Nome. Had they not been a law-abiding class of people there would have been trouble, riot, and bloodshed at Nome. Not only are they law-abiding, but they are a race that instinctively insist upon fair play and a "square deal." We can turn to them with full reliance that they will use the machinery which we place in their hands in an honest and just way, and they will not permit this machinery to be tampered with.

The number of voting precincts to be established in each mining district is to be determined by the residents of the mining districts, and judges and clerks selected for each voting precinct, and certification of the results forwarded to the governor. The gentleman from Illinois stated that the governor of Alaska would not have any means of knowing who were really the judges and clerks. I would like to ask him if in the great State of Illinois, when the governor sits down to canvass the returns that are brought to him, he knows who the judges and clerks of the various election precincts are in that sovereign State?

Mr. MANN. They are not sent to him, and he does not know them.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Are they sent to the secretary of state?

Mr. MANN. Not the judges and clerks.

Mr. CUSHMAN. How about the canvass of the counties?

Mr. MANN. That is done by the county officers, and the governor knows all the county officers.

Mr. CUSHMAN. A proposition very similar to that is presented by the provisions of this bill. The precinct judges and clerks are appointed at a meeting duly called—called by the only legal officer that there is in the mining district.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would like to ask the gentleman from Washington to state a fact. I notice in the bill that at a precinct where the judges appointed by the miners' meeting did not attend and qualify, or if he is not there, that the judges and clerks would be selected by the bystanders, the same as is done in our system here. The governor would absolutely have no way to ascertain if these men were judges or clerks.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Before answering that question, I wish to submit one other observation, and then I will endeavor to answer the gentleman's question. Throughout this debate objection has been made that there was no proper way by which we could create these election districts and call an election. That is by reason of the fact that there never has been any legislation to speak of enacted in this House for Alaska, and the reason that there has never been any legislation enacted for Alaska was because they had no representative here to press their wants and needs upon us.

Now, then, the opponents of this bill are trying to chase us around this kind of a circle: When we try to frame the machinery for the election of a Delegate they say we have not information enough about the country to properly frame the bill; then when we ask for a Delegate from Alaska to give us the desired information, they say that we do not have the proper machinery to elect one. That is a very ingenious position for any man to take; but let me ask you how many times do you think we would have to chase ourselves around that circle before we reached the proper point from which to start? [Laughter.]

This bill provides the first framework for an election in Alaska. The bill provides that all incorporated cities or towns in Alaska shall each constitute one election precinct. Nobody in this debate has disputed the wisdom of that provision. Then in all the region lying outside incorporated towns the creation of election precincts is left to the residents of the territory to be divided. It is made the duty of the commissioner of each mining district to call the meeting for the purpose of creating the voting precincts.

The commissioner is the only legal and recognized officer in the mining district, and therefore it is proper that he should call the meeting. It is provided that he shall give due notice of the date and place of the meeting. When the meeting day arrives, those present organize the meeting by the selection of a chairman and a secretary.

They shall then decide at that meeting how many precincts are to be created in the mining district; second, what the boundaries of the election precincts shall be and who shall be the judges and clerks of election in each precinct.

The announcement of their decision of all these matters shall be publicly made before the meeting adjourns, and, furthermore, the result of their determination shall be published as widely as may be throughout the mining district.

The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. STEWART] indulged in one remark on this floor in the debate upon this bill that struck me as a most remarkable observation. Speaking of the people in Alaska, he said they were "a fugitive lot," meaning, I presume, that they were too migratory to deserve representation.

I tell you, sir, they have not been such "a fugitive lot" but that the United States Government has succeeded within the last three years in collecting $400,000 in taxes out of them. They were not hot-footed, swift, nor elusive enough to escape a Federal tax collector in the midst of their domain! [Applause.] I suggest, sir, that a people who are permanent enough to permit taxation are permanent enough to deserve representation. We have collected about $9,000,000 in Federal revenue out of that Territory since we have had possession of it. It is a self-evident proposition that there must be something up there when we can derive a revenue like that from the people of Alaska.

Now, then, a word on the substitute proposed by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE]. He proposed to give these people representation, but in a person in whose selection they have no voice. I would rather see this bill fail utterly than see a proposition like that carry.

I want a person from that Territory who will truly represent the people and be responsible to them,

It is proposed that the President shall appoint a Delegate for them. No one has greater respect for or confidence in the President of the United States than I have. But over a century ago, in the first experiment of true free government that was ever launched, it was determined in our Constitution that there should be three distinct coordinate branches of our Government—the legislative, the executive, and the judicial. I do not believe that the Executive has any power or right to appoint even a Delegate to sit in this legislative body.

The President performed his full constitutional duty when in his last message to this House he recommended that Alaska have a Delegate in Congress. Let us now perform our constitutional duty by providing the means whereby they may secure that Delegate. [Applause.]

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. I want to ask the gentleman if there is any provision in his bill or otherwise to ascertain the eligible legal voters of Alaska?

Mr. CUSHMAN. The qualifications of the voters are prescribed in the bill. A man in order to be eligible to vote under the provisions of this bill shall first be a citizen of the United States, have reached the age of 21 years, be able to read and write and speak English or some other European language, and have resided in Alaska ninety days.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Do you provide any officer to exact the information from the voter?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Yes. The bill provides that the vote of any man who offers his vote may be challenged by an election officer, and thereupon he shall swear in his vote in the same manner that every man swears in his vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired. The time for general debate has expired, and the Clerk will read the bill.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Is the bill H. R. 16653 before the committee, or is it the bill 9865?

The CHAIRMAN. The bill H. R. 9865 is before the committee. The gentleman from Washington obtained unanimous consent that the text of the bill H. R. 16653 should be treated as pending as an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the bill before the committee.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill H. R. 9865.

Mr. CUSHMAN (interrupting the reading). Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CUSHMAN. The original bill having never been read, is it now in order to ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the original bill be dispensed with and the substitute read in lieu thereof under the five-minute rule?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that would be in order.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the bill H. R. 9865 be suspended, and that the text of the bill H. R. 16653 be read under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent that the further reading of the original bill, H. R. 9865, under the five-minute rule, be dispensed with, and that the amendment offered upon yesterday, and which the committee directed should be treated as pending, be read in its stead, under the five-minute rule. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

That a Delegate to the House of Representatives of the United States from the Territory of Alaska shall be chosen by the people thereof, who shall be a citizen of the United States, and who shall discharge like duties and be entitled to the same rights, privileges, and emoluments as are discharged, exercised, and enjoyed by Delegates from the several Territories of the United States in the House of Representatives: Provided, however, That such Delegate in lieu of all other allowances shall, in addition to his salary, receive the sum of $1,500 per annum, which shall cover all mileage and other expenses except the stationery allowance and compensation for clerk hire.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, in line 4, by striking out the word "Territory" and inserting the word "district."

In line 4 strike out the words "shall be chosen by" and all of line 5 and insert "who shall be a citizen of the United States and an actual resident for at least two years of such district, and shall be appointed by the President."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making an inquiry. I want to ask why the mileage was fixed at a lump sum of $1,500?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Chairman, I stated yesterday, as appears in this morning's RECORD, the facts in regard to that matter, which, if the gentleman from New York can find time to read, will explain the matter fully; but I will endeavor briefly to state what the situation is.

The usual mileage allowed to all members of Congress, and likewise to all Delegates, is 20 cents a mile each way, or 40 cents per mile one way from the place of their residence to the city of Washington, in attendance upon every regular session of Congress. But when the bill was submitted in this House providing for two resident commissioners from the Philippine Islands, a lump sum of $2,000 was therein provided for their mileage in attending each regular session of Congress, and it seemed, as the mileage of an Alaskan Delegate would be very large, that we would be justified in substituting in place of the regular mileage, provision for a lump sum of $1,500.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. Then it is much less than the regular mileage would be?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Oh, yes; much less.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That in order to be qualified to vote for said Delegate to Congress a person shall—

First. Be a male citizen of the United States and have resided in Alaska not less than ninety days immediately preceding the election at which he offers to vote.

Second. Have attained the age of 21 years.

Third. Be able to read and write the English or some other European language.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I desire to offer an amendment to this paragraph—to strike out "ninety days," in line 23, and to insert in lieu thereof "six months;" so that it will read: "Be a male citizen of the United States and have resided in Alaska not less than six months immediately preceding the election at which he offers to vote."

Mr. Chairman, this amendment will, I think, come nearer than the provision of the bill as it stands to securing the elective franchise to people who are really bona fide Alaskans, and who do not belong to the great floating population about which we have heard so much. A great many of the State constitutions—in fact, all of them, I believe—require at least six months' residence to enable a man to vote. If we require simply ninety days' residence, a man may go up there from the United States on a summer trip, and under this provision may exercise the rights of an elector.

Mr. BARTLETT. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee by striking out——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that a further amendment offered now would be an amendment in the third degree, and would not be permissible under the rules. The Committee of the Whole is now considering an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the whole bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. Then I ask the gentleman from Tennessee to modify his amendment so as to provide for one year's residence instead of six months.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am willing to accept that modification.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee will be modified as proposed.

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, this bill as originally reported to the House—No. 9865—contained in section 10 a provision that an elector in the district of Alaska should be a resident there for not less than one year preceding the election at which he offers to vote, and should reside in the election precinct not less than sixty days.

Most of the States of the Union, in fact, all whose constitutions I am familiar with, require of a voter a residence of at least twelve months in the State, six months in the county, and ninety days in the election precinct. This bill does not contain any provision requiring registration of the voter, nor does it provide for any other means for identifying the voter. As I understand it, the provision requiring that the party who offers to vote shall have resided in Alaska twelve months will not in any way interfere with the exercise of the elective franchise by people who are actual residents. It does not mean to prohibit people who are bona fide residents of Alaska from going away from there and returning.

Any man who is an actual resident and may go away with the intention of returning would be entitled to vote. But to permit persons to vote, as the bill in the form now pending proposes, simply upon a residence of ninety days, would, it seems to me, allow persons to vote who might be visiting the Territory for short periods and who have no real interest in Alaskan affairs. In other words, it would allow the carrying of voters into Alaska for the purpose merely of determining the election.

Mr. PAYNE. Does the gentleman suppose that any citizens of the United States would go to Alaska simply for the purpose of voting for Delegate?

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not know. Persons have been known to go into New York from other States, and from New York to other States, for the sole purpose of voting.

Mr. PAYNE. I never heard of that. I have known of their coming from other States to New York.

Mr. BARTLETT. I have said all I desire to say on this subject.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. GAINES of Tennessee as modified, it was rejected; there being, on a division—ayes 27, noes 51.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, as a new subdivision, between lines 24 and 25, these words:
"Second, be a resident ninety days in the city, town, precinct, or district where he offers to vote."

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, just a word. The bill which the gentleman from Washington introduced at first had a similar provision, omitted in this bill. There is no provision in the pending bill that a man must live in the precinct where he offers to vote any length of time, but just simply that he has been in Alaska for "ninety days." This amendment requires that he must be a resident of the ward, precinct, or district in which he offers to vote at least ninety days before he will be allowed to vote. It is not only the usual regulation, but a very proper one for the purpose of identification.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington in the nature of a substitute.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House, with the recommendation that all after the enacting clause of the pending bill be stricken out, that the text of the substitute bill be inserted in lieu thereof, and that the bill as thus amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SMITH of Iowa, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 9865, the Alaskan Delegate bill, and had directed him to report the same back with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, with the recommendation that the bill as thus amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CUSHMAN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

SENATE.

SATURDAY, January 24, 1903.

Prayer by Rev. F. J. PRETTYMAN, of the city of Washington.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. QUAY, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Journal will stand approved.

PROPOSED CHANGE IN HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, before the order of petitions and memorials is called, I wish to state that the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] will to-day report the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill and on Monday ask the Senate to proceed to its consideration. In view of that fact, and to expedite the public business generally, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock on Monday next.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I hope that will not be done. The committees of the body are very busy now in bringing the business of the session to a close, and the work that is done in committees is a better preparation in the way of enforcing speed in legislation than anything else. I have never known that work at this stage of the session to be interrupted by 11 o'clock meetings. There certainly is nothing in the condition of the business which demands it. The Committee on Appropriations does not ask it. That committee does not expect to take up any undue time of the Senate. It never visits upon the Senate long speeches. It reports its bills, I may say, after great study and preparation, and the confidence the body has always displayed in the reports of that committee insures speedy passage. I do not expect that any controversy will arise upon the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill and I do not expect that it will take a long time.

The Committee on Appropriations has not, Mr. President, sought to interfere with the Senator's programme, and will certainly, if driven by the Senator in his desire to do unaccountable things and unusual things in the interest of the measure he is espousing——

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. The motion is not debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is well taken. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. QUAY. Now I desire to say a word in explanation of the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. HALE. I shall not make the point of order against the Senator from Pennsylvania. I shall hereafter find an opportunity to say what I desire.

Mr. QUAY. I wish to say, in explanation of the motion, that my desire was simply to expedite public business. The Senator from Maine certainly misstates the condition of affairs in the Senate. It is not an ordinary one. It is an extraordinary one. The public business is blocked, and more time will be required for its transaction owing to the condition of affairs here. But if gentlemen who oppose the statehood bill object to allotting more time to the transaction of the public business, for the present I will withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn. Petitions and memorials are in order.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BURTON. I present a concurrent resolution of the legislature of the State of Kansas, praying for the enactment of legislation to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I ask that the resolution may be read and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

There being no objection, the resolution was read, and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, as follows:

Be it resolved by the legislature of the State of Kansas, two-thirds of the members elected to each house joining and concurring therein:

Whereas the exclusive power to regulate commerce among the several States is vested by the Constitution of the United States in Congress, and the power of the individual State is thereby limited to the regulation of commerce within its own bounds, and to such subjects only as are not a part of interstate commerce; and

Whereas flagrant discriminations by railroad companies still continue in the interstate carrying trade, which greatly injure the interests and rights of the people, most particularly in central and western Kansas, as was glaringly shown in testimony taken in the hearings before members of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the lumber and grain cases at Wichita, September 24–27, 1902, which discriminations the legislature of the State of Kansas has not sufficient power to prevent; and

Whereas recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States have rendered many of the most important provisions of the interstate-commerce law inoperative, in consequence of which the law, in its present form, fails to afford the relief to the shipping interests which was the purpose of its enactment; and

Whereas the President, in his messages to Congress; Senator CULLOM, the author of the act now in force; the legislatures of several States, and over one hundred commercial organizations interested in interstate commerce, including the Missouri, Kansas and Oklahoma Lumber Dealers' Association, unite in agreeing upon the urgent necessity for the immediate passage of a more efficient interstate-commerce act, to the end that the unjust discriminations which now exist in freight rates shall be controlled; and

Whereas the matter of satisfactory and effective law to accomplish this result has been carefully considered by the executive committee of the interstate-commerce law convention, the present Interstate Commerce Commission, and others fully capable to determine upon the form of such an act, and have agreed upon a bill which is known as the "revised Elkins bill," which bill is now pending in the United States Congress: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring therein), That we urge upon Congress the immediate passage of said act, deeming further delay in doing so greatly detrimental to the interests of the people of the State; and that Congress will be inexcusably remiss in its duty unless it shall at once take action upon this matter.

Resolved further, That the Senators and Representatives from Kansas in Congress be instructed to do their utmost to accomplish the above results, and that a copy of these resolutions be sent to each of them and to each member of the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate and House of Representatives.

USE OF WATER FOR GENERATING POWER.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to call up from the table the bill which was read twice yesterday, and to have it referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays the bill before the Senate.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 7090) to regulate the use of the waters of navigable water courses for the purpose of generating power by riparian proprietors.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to say that I introduced this bill for a general public purpose which, I think, is important in itself, and I will ask leave to insert in my remarks extracts from some opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States and of the State of Alabama, in 95 Alabama Reports, upon the question involved in it. I do this for the purpose of relieving the committee of work.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator, and the quotations will be inserted in his speech.

The matter referred to is as follows:

We can not concur in the argument of counsel to the effect that whether a grant of the United States to land lying on a navigable stream within the limits of a State extends to high or to low-water mark or to the middle thread of the stream is a Federal question, upon which the Supreme Court of the United States is the final arbiter. This is not the law. On the contrary, no proposition of law is more firmly settled than that this is a matter purely within the control of the several States and determinable in all instances according to the rule in respect thereto which has been established by statute or by adjudications of courts of last resort or otherwise by the States themselves. And whatever rule has been so established is said to be the common law of the State where the land is situated, and as such will be enforced in all jurisdiction. This doctrine proceeds on the theory that inasmuch as the State owns in its sovereign capacity the soil under the waters of navigable streams, it is within the State's competency to determine to what extent its prerogatives to lands so submerged shall be exercised, and to what extent such prerogative shall be abated, or not asserted and exercised, in the sense of admitting individual proprietorship in such lands, subject only to those rights of eminent domain over the waters and the lands covered thereby which are inseparable from sovereignty.

And upon this theory it is universally held that a grant by the United States of land lying in a State and abutting on a navigable stream will extend to high-water mark, or low-water mark, or to the middle of the stream, according to the rule which the particular State has adopted as to the construction and extent of such grade. The late Justice Bradley, in a recent case, after stating the doctrine of the State's proprietorship in the banks and shores of navigable streams and waters, proceeds:

"This right of the States to regulate and control the shores of tide waters and the land under them is the same as that which is exercised by the Crown in England. In this country the same rule has been extended to our great navigable lakes, which are treated as inland seas; and also, in some of the States, to navigable rivers, as the Mississippi, the Missouri, the Ohio, and in Pennsylvania to all the permanent rivers of the State; but it depends on the law of each State to what waters and to what extent this prerogative of the State over the lands under water shall be exercised. In the case of Barney v. Keokuk (94 U. S., 324) we held that it is for the several States themselves to determine this question, and that if they chose to resign to the riparian proprietor rights which properly belong to them in their sovereign capacity, it is not for others to raise objections. That was a case which arose in the State of Iowa, in regard to land on the banks of the Mississippi, in the city of Keokuk; and it appearing to be the settled law of that State that the title of riparian proprietors on the banks of the Mississippi extends only to ordinary high-water mark, and that the shore between high and low water mark, as well as the bed of the river, belongs to the State, this court accepted the local law as that which was to govern the case.

"The same view was taken in quite a recent case with regard to titles on the Sacramento River, under the law of California. (Packer v. Bird, 137 U. S., 661.) On the east side of the Mississippi, in the States of Illinois and Mississippi, a different doctrine prevails, and in those States it is held that the title of the riparian proprietor extends to the middle of the current, in conformity to the rule of the common law that the beds of all streams above the flow of the tide, whether actually navigable or not, belong to the proprietor of the adjoining lands. (Middleton v. Pritchard, 3 Scammon, 510; Morgan v. Reading, 3 Sm. & Mar., 366; St. Louis v. Rutz, 138 U. S., 226.) In the one case, that of Iowa, the Government grant was held to extend only to high-water mark, and in the other cases, of Illinois and Mississippi, it was held to extend to the center of the streams, being governed in both cases by the respective laws of the States affecting the grants of lands bordering on the river. In the one case the State, by its general law, does not allow the grant to inure to the individual further than to the water's edge, reserving to itself the ownership and control of the river bed; in the other cases the States allow the full common-law effect of the grant to inure to the grantee." (Hardin v. Jordan, 140 U. S., 371, 382-383; Webb v. Demopolis, 95 Alabama Reports, 127-129.)

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Ardenia Dillon."

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE IN ST. CHARLES COUNTY, MO.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6569) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at a point to be selected within 10 miles of the corporate limits of the city of St. Charles, in St. Charles County, Mo., and in St. Louis County, Mo., and to make the same a post route. The bill has been favorably reported from the Committee on Commerce, and is in the usual form.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, page 2, line 1, after the word "Missouri," to insert "at a point not less than 1 mile distant from any existing bridge;" so as to read:

That the Iowa and Missouri Railway Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Missouri and authorized by the laws of the State of Missouri to locate and construct its railway into and through the counties of St. Charles and St. Louis, in said State, is hereby authorized to construct and maintain a bridge across the Missouri River on such line as its railway may hereafter be located in the counties of St. Charles and St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, at a point not less than 1 mile distant from any existing bridge, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 2, line 18, after the word "spans," to strike out:

It shall not be in any case of less elevation than 50 feet above high-water mark, as registered since the year 1870, as understood at the point of location, to the lowest point of the superstructure, with straight girders; nor shall the main channel span of said bridge be less than 400 feet in the clear at low-water mark, and all other spans over the waterway shall not be less than 300 feet in the clear.

And insert—

At least three of the spans over the waterway shall give a clear channel width of not less than 400 feet at low-water surface and clear headroom of not less than 55 feet above high-water surface.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 3, line 6, after the word "be," to strike out "and the main span shall be over the main channel of the river;" so as to read:

And the piers of the said bridge shall be parallel with the current of the river, and the bridge itself at right angles thereto, as near as may be.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 4, line 3, after the word "said," to strike out "channel" and insert "draw;" and in line 4, after the word "War," to insert:

And shall, at their own expense, maintain a depth of water through said draw spans not less than that now existing, as shown by the records of the War Department, at the point where said bridge may be located.

So as to read:

Provided, That said company, its successors or assigns, shall maintain, at its own expense, from sunset until sunrise, such lights or other signals on said bridge as the Light-House Board shall prescribe, and shall build and maintain such sheer booms or other structures as may be necessary to safely guide vessels, rafts, or other water craft through said draw spans, and as shall receive the approval of the Secretary of War, and shall, at their own expense, maintain a depth of water through said draw spans not less than that now existing, as shown by the records of the War Department, at the point where said bridge may be located.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, page 5, line 7, after the word "substantially," to insert "or materially;" so as to read:

And whenever said bridge shall, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, substantially or materially obstruct the free navigation of said river, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE W. M'COMB.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2591) granting an increase of pension to George W. McComb.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill; which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments, in line 7, after the word "and," to strike out "of;" in line 8, before the word "Veteran," to insert "Regiment," and in line 9, before the word "dollars," to strike out "fifty" and insert "twenty-four;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of George W. McComb, late of Company I, Eighth Regiment Michigan Volunteer Cavalry, and Company K, Eighth Regiment Veteran Reserve Corps, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STREET RAILWAY TRACK ACROSS AQUEDUCT BRIDGE.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 10522) to provide for laying a single electric street-railway track across the Aqueduct Bridge, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill named by him, which will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection of the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ALLISON. This is an important bill, as it seems to me, Mr. President, and I inquire if it has been reported by any committee.

Mr. MARTIN. Yes; it has been reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia, and it has the strongest possible recommendation from the Commissioners of the District.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, we have had several investigations and examinations in regard to this matter, and we have been told in the past that the piers upon which this structure rests are not of sufficient strength to justify the construction of a street railway across the bridge.

Mr. MARTIN. If the Senator will excuse me, this bill provides exactly for that condition. It requires the street railway companies proposing to make use of the bridge to furnish all money for having the piers strengthened and reconstructed to such an extent as may be found necessary in the judgment of the Commissioners of the District.

Mr. ALLISON. This bridge has hitherto, as I understand, been under the control of the War Department, so far as construction is concerned, and I think they still have control of it.

Of course I do not want to impede the general desire to have a street railway across this structure, but I should like to ask the Senator if the Secretary of War and the engineer in charge have recommended the passage of the bill?

Mr. MARTIN. I should not like to make a positive statement about that, but I think so. I am sure the measure has had the careful investigation at one time or another of both the War Department engineers and the District engineer. I think an engineer of the War Department has stated that the time would come at no very distant future when it would be necessary to completely rebuild this bridge, but he has reported that for a great many years this expenditure will be sufficient.

There is no letter filed with the report from the War Department engineer, but I am sure this measure has had the approbation of the War Department; certainly it has had a thorough investigation by the engineer who is a member of the District Board of Commissioners. It is a House bill of very great importance to the people desiring railway facilities for entering the District, and they are anxious that this legislation should be had.

I hope very much that the Senator from Iowa will not impede the passage of the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I will only impede it for a moment in order that I may obtain information regarding the provisions of the bill.

Do I understand that the companies who propose to construct this street railway agree to repair the piers of the bridge and put them in such condition that they can be used, and that they are to pay the expenditure for that purpose?

Mr. MARTIN. They do; and the bill so provides. They have to advance the money.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; then, that is sufficient.

Mr. HEITFELD. I desire to say that there is a provision in the bill that the cost shall be not to exceed $35,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; that is right.

Mr. MARTIN. But the Commissioners estimate the cost to be $25,000; so the bill requires $10,000 more than the estimate made by the Engineer Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARKING OF GRAVES OF CONFEDERATE SOLDIERS.

Mr. FORAKER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6486) to provide for the appropriate marking of the graves of the soldiers of the Confederate army and navy, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information, subject to objection.

The Secretary read the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, I understand the bill confines the appropriation and the burial of Confederate dead to those who died in Northern prisons, and does not affect the South at all.

Mr. FORAKER. That is true.

Mr. BATE. That is the way I read the bill. I wish to say in this connection that we in the South have taken care of our Confederate dead as far as possible, and intend doing so. This, however, is confined to those who died in Northern prisons, I understand.

Mr. FORAKER. That is true. It applies to about 30,000 graves altogether, and they are the graves of those who died in Northern prisons and who were buried in the North, near the places of their confinement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments reported by the Committee on Military Affairs will be stated.

The first amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, in line 6, before the word "war," to insert "late civil," and in the same line, after the word "war," to strike out "between the States;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to ascertain the locations and condition of all the graves of the soldiers of the Confederate army and navy in the late civil war, 1861 to 1865, who died in Federal prisons and military hospitals in the North, and who were buried near their places of confinement.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 19, before the word "hundred," to strike out "one" and insert "two;" so as to read:

That for the carrying out of the objects set forth herein there be appropriated, out of the money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senator from Ohio if he will look at the title of the bill and see if it reads exactly as he desires. It says "soldiers of the Confederate army and navy."

Mr. FORAKER. I am obliged to the Senator from Massachusetts for calling my attention to that point. I think the title should be amended so as to read "A bill to provide for the appropriate marking of the graves of the soldiers of the Confederate army and navy who died in prisons of the United States and were buried near their places of confinement."

Mr. HOAR. Should it not be "of the soldiers of the Confederate army and the sailors of the navy," or some such phrase? It seems to read "the soldiers of the Confederate army and navy."

Mr. FORAKER. Oh!

Mr. HOAR. I am merely asking the Senator to consider it. I do not want to meddle with the bill.

Mr. FORAKER. I think that is a very appropriate suggestion. It should be "soldiers and sailors." There should be inserted in the title after the word "soldiers" the words "and sailors."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title will be amended as suggested by the Senator from Ohio.

FRANK E. FREEMAN.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 3632) granting an increase of pension to Frank E. Freeman.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Frank E. Freeman, late of Battery B, First Regiment Ohio Volunteer Light Artillery, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIEUT. COMMANDER ARTHUR P. OSBORN.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 4905) authorizing the President to nominate Lieut. Commander Arthur P. Osborn to be a commander on the retired list of the Navy.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with amendments, in line 5, after the word "now," to strike out "no" and insert "on;" in line 6, after the word "Navy," to strike out "and entitled to all the provisions and benefits of section 11 of the act of March 3, 1899, entitled 'An act to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy and Marine Corps of the United States,'" and to insert "with the rank and pay of that grade from the date of appointment under this act;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate to the Senate Lieut. Commander Arthur P. Osborn, now on the retired list of the Navy, to be a commander on the retired list of the United States Navy, with the rank and pay of that grade from the date of appointment under this act.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MONUMENTS TO GENERALS NASH AND DAVIDSON.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 16) to carry into effect two resolutions of the Continental Congress directing monuments to be erected to the memory of Gens. Francis Nash and William Lee Davidson, of North Carolina.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution which will be read.

Mr. QUAY. The joint resolution, I think, was read the other day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was read.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir; it has been read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And objection was made to its consideration by——

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], who will withdraw his objection, I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. QUAY. I do not desire to object, but I understand that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] has a bill which he desires to present for the consideration of the Senate after this is disposed of, and I wish to say——

Mr. HEITFELD rose.

Mr. QUAY. Unless the Senator from Idaho desires to proceed with one, I will object, then, to the consideration of any other bills.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from Idaho desires to proceed before I do.

Mr. HEITFELD. I do. I wish to call up a pension bill.

Mr. QUAY. Then I will include the Senator from Idaho. When those three measures are disposed of, I will call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It proposes to appropriate $5,000 each for the erection of monuments in honor of the memory of Brig. Gen. Francis Nash, of North Carolina, and of Brig. Gen. William Lee Davidson, of North Carolina.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading; read the third time, and passed.

SAMUEL L. THOMPSON.

Mr. HEITFELD. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6191) granting an increase of pension to Samuel L. Thompson.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments in line 6, after the word "late," to strike out "chief" and insert "principal;" and in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Samuel L. Thompson, late principal musician Fourth Regiment Vermont Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES D. KIPER.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 14518) granting an increase of pension to James D. Kiper.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of James D. Kiper, late of Company I, Twenty-seventh Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, and to pay him a pension of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STATEHOOD BILL.

Mr. QUAY rose.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. QUAY. I was about to demand the regular order.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I will wait until the Senator from Pennsylvania has demanded the regular order.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I ask for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is the bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. QUAY. Certainly.

REGULATION OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I ask that unanimous consent be given to vote upon the bill (H. R. 12199) to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States at 3 o'clock on February 2.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the bill known as the immigration bill shall be voted upon, with all pending amendments and amendments then offered, at 3 o'clock on February 2. Is there objection?

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, yesterday I interposed an objection to a request for unanimous consent to fix a time for taking a vote on the bill, but I have been informed by the committee that those in charge of the bill will not insist on lines 5, 6, 7, and 8, on page 18 of the bill, and with those lines stricken out I have no further objection.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. MASON. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. FORAKER. I was about to suggest that there ought to be incorporated in the agreement a proviso that we shall vote at that time upon the bill and all amendments without further debate.

CONSIDERATION OF PENSION BILLS.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I desire to inquire who has the floor, if anybody?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No one, except the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. QUAY. I understand the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BURNHAM] has the floor upon the statehood bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask my colleague to yield to me for one moment to make a request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to his colleague?

Mr. BURNHAM. With pleasure.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, there are a considerable number of pension bills on the Calendar in which Senators and others are greatly interested, and I rise to request that this afternoon at 5 o'clock one hour be devoted to the consideration of those bills or such portion of an hour as may be necessary to clear the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that at 5 o'clock to-day the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected pension cases for one hour, if that time be necessary. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

Mr. DUBOIS. Do I understand that we will take up the bills in the regular order?

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly; in their order.

POST-OFFICE AT INDIANOLA, MISS.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. President——
Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?
Mr. BURNHAM. Certainly.
Mr. SPOONER. I take the floor on the statehood bill technically only. I do not intend to address to the Senate a word upon the subject of statehood for New Mexico, Arizona, or Oklahoma, and I wish no misunderstanding of my purpose in asking the Senator from New Hampshire to yield to me for a few moments. I hope I will not be regarded, either, Mr. President, as rising for the purpose of obstructing in any manner the consideration of the bill. I am somewhat impressed with the notion that even the Senator from Pennsylvania is not burdened with that keen sense of necessity for constant pressure of this bill which he indicated the other day, in view of the fact that every day when this bill is reached so much time is taken, by his gracious permission, by Senators in calling up and having disposed of bills which have no relation of course to the subject which constitutes the unfinished business. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] suggests to me that he will remedy that on Monday.

How long the Senator will be permitted by the Senate to hold the floor and allow no business to be done, except speeches upon the statehood bill, save with his permission, of course I do not know. That will be a matter for the Senate to determine. The Senator is within his strict parliamentary rights, but it is rather a humiliating attitude—I express only my own judgment—that day after day the public business should be done in this way—bills called up and passed, the Senator objecting to even a report being read in order that the Senate may know on what it is called upon to vote.

Mr. QUAY. This discussion, if the Senator will permit me——
Mr. MASON. Mr. President——
The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SIMMONS in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Illinois?
Mr. SPOONER. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.
Mr. MASON. I merely wanted to ask the Senator if he is not chairman of the Committee on Rules, and if there has not been pending before his committee, without a report, for nearly six years, a proposed rule whereby the majority of this body can transact business?
Mr. SPOONER. I think a proposition of that kind has been pending for nearly sixty years.
Mr. MASON. No; not so long as that, because at one time, within forty years, there was a chance whereby the majority could do business in this body; but since that change of practice the business of the public is left entirely in the hands of the minority.

Mr. SPOONER. I think the Senate, without any rule of the kind referred to by the Senator from Illinois, transacts as much legislative business as any other legislative body in the world, and it does it, too, upon debate, generally with full consideration, with very little friction and in an intelligent and public-spirited way.

On January 15 the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN] rose to a question of privilege and submitted some observations concerning the post-office and the conduct of the postal business at Indianola, Miss. It was not in any sense, although I do not say that to criticise the Senator, a matter of privilege, but it was a matter which was not before the Senate and a matter therefore upon which no one can speak except he take the floor upon some measure.

I wish to say two things in the beginning, and I shall not occupy much of the time of the Senate. In the first place, I do not criticise the Senator from Mississippi for what he said. His speech was a temperate one and a courteous one to the President and to the Postmaster-General. No one could have spoken upon a subject of this kind or of any kind in finer spirit than he did.

I want to say another thing, Mr. President. I do not intend to discuss or to be drawn into a discussion of what is called the negro question or the race question. I intend to confine myself to what I think is a fair view, as I understand it, of the circumstances surrounding the Indianola post-office matter; and I justify entirely the attitude of the Postmaster-General, who is a distinguished citizen of my State, and the President in regard to it.

The Senator from Mississippi based his observations entirely upon a short extract from a statement which, he says, was "made by Secretary Cortelyou for the President in reference to the suspension of business in the Indianola post-office in the State of Mississippi." I send to the desk and ask to have read the entire statement from which that extract was taken, for that statement in many papers in the country has been published in garbled form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

The postmaster at Indianola, Miss., is Mrs. Minnie M. Cox, a colored woman. She served three years as postmaster under President Harrison. When President McKinley came in she was again appointed, in 1897, nearly six years ago. Her character and standing in the community are indorsed by the best and most reputable people in the town. Among those on her bond is the present Democratic State senator from the district, together with the leading banker of Indianola, and an ex-State senator from the district, also a Democrat. The postmaster and her husband own from $10,000 to $15,000 worth of property in Sunflower County. The reports of the post-office inspectors who have investigated the office from time to time show that she has given the utmost satisfaction to all the patrons of the office; that she is at all times courteous, faithful, competent, and honest in the discharge of her duties. Her moral standing in the community is of the highest. Her reputation is of the best. Few offices of this grade in any State are conducted better.

The postmaster recently forwarded her resignation to take effect on January 1, but the report of inspectors and information received from various reputable white citizens of the town and neighborhood show that the resignation was forced by a brutal and lawless element, purely upon the ground of her color, and was obtained under terror of threats of physical violence.

The mayor of the town and the sheriff of the county both told the post-office inspector that if she refused to resign they could not be answerable for her safety, although at the same time not one word was said against her management of the office.

On January 1 the bondsmen of the postmaster telegraphed that the post-office was closed; that the postmaster claimed that her resignation was in the President's hands, to take effect January 1, and that there had been no advice of the appointment of her successor. The telegram closed with this statement: "Prompt action necessary for relief of business interests." In the view of the President the relief of the business interests, which are being injured solely by the action of the lawless element of the town, is wholly secondary to the preservation of law and order and the assertion of the fundamental principle that this Government will not connive at or tolerate wrong and outrage of such flagrant character.

By direction of the President the following telegram was sent by the Postmaster-General to the bondsmen:

"The postmaster's resignation has been received, but not accepted. In view of the fact that the office at Indianola is closed, all mail addressed to that office will be forwarded to Greenville."

The papers in the case have been sent to the Attorney-General for action.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi in his observations assumed that there is in that statement, issued by authority, as he said, of the President, and I have no reason to doubt that it was issued by authority of the President, a general characterization or arraignment of the people of Indianola as brutal and lawless, and he proceeded to say:

I know the people of that community, and they are not a lawless or a brutal element. They are a high-toned, chivalrous, intelligent, industrious, and thrifty people, and a law-abiding people.

That is not controverted in this statement. The Senator will find in that document no such general characterization of that people as he assumes. I will venture to say that there is no man in the country who would be less likely to impeach in such a general way the citizens of Indianola. The statement there is that the resignation of this postmistress was forced by a brutal and lawless element in the community. There are communities all over the United States composed of people who, taken as a whole, are chivalrous, just, and law abiding, but it would be a rare thing, I think, North or South, to find a community of fifteen hundred or two thousand people in which there is not a lawless and brutal element.

The President was informed by the papers that a majority of the people of Indianola are such as the Senator describes them to be, and that they were opposed to the proceedings which forced—I say forced—the resignation of this postmistress. And one authority for it—and I do not intend to give the name either, the Senator from Mississippi is aware of it; is one which would be without hesitation accepted by a President or by the Senate——

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him there?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi. My attention was called by the Senator from Texas at the time his statement was made, and I did not catch what it was the Senator said I was aware of.

Mr. SPOONER. I said there is the highest possible authority in the papers which were before the President, establishing the fact, which could not be gainsaid, that the large majority of the people of that community are such as the Senator described—peaceable and law-abiding people, who deprecate the action of the minority which forced this resignation, but who did not prevent it.

Mr. MCLAURIN. Lest I by my silence may be considered as acquiescing, as being aware of it, I must dissent from the statement of the Senator. I am not aware of that.

Mr. SPOONER. I was informed by the Postmaster-General that he had read the papers in this matter to the Senator from Mississippi, including the particular paper which I had in my mind when I made the statement.

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi. The Postmaster-General read to me a portion of the first report of the post-office inspector and he read to me also the letter of the Congressman-elect from that district. If he read anything other than that, I do not recall it at this time.

Mr. SPOONER. The letter of the Congressman-elect was the letter to which I refer, and I would not have identified the writer——

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi. Has the Senator seen all the papers in the possession of the President and the Postmaster-General in reference to this matter?

Mr. SPOONER. I have seen the papers, the reports of the inspectors, and I have seen a large number of letters. I have seen the brief which is usually made up in the Department giving a concise statement of all the papers upon which the President acted.

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi. Has the Senator reason to believe that any of the papers are in the possession of the President or the Postmaster-General in connection with this matter that he has not seen?

Mr. SPOONER. I have no reason to believe it.

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi. I did not catch the answer of the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. I have no reason to believe it. I did not read all the papers. There were no papers, I am quite certain, that were important that my attention was not called to, and that I might not have read had I so desired.

Now, Mr. President, is is perfectly clear, to begin with, and no one can dispute it, that this postmistress resigned. That is established by the Senator. It is perfectly clear also that her term of office had not expired and would not expire for a year. It is perfectly clear also, Mr. President, that she did not desire to resign; that she desired to continue to the end of her term to discharge the duties of that office as an agent of the United States.

The Senator furnished some evidence intended to exculpate the people of Indianola from a charge not made against them, which clearly shows the method which was pursued to make her anxious speedily to tender what is called a voluntary resignation. He read the letter of P. C. Chapman, a prominent lawyer in that community, whom he characterizes as an honorable gentleman, and I have no purpose to controvert it. I know of no ground upon which it could be controverted. It is interesting reading.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, I desire, by his permission, to ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, I would be very glad if the Senator would inform us, if he has the information, how and by whom this postmistress was forced to resign.

Mr. SPOONER. I am about to do that, Mr. President, though I can not take the time to furnish all of the abundant evidence, upon which no President, I think, whatever his politics might be, could come to any other conclusion than that she was forced to resign. She was in the discharge of her duties. She was appointed first by President Harrison. During Mr. Cleveland's Administration she was not postmistress. She was reappointed by President McKinley, and she has not been, of course, appointed by President Roosevelt, for her term under President McKinley's appointment does not expire for a year.

She was appointed by the President of the United States without a contest, confirmed by this body, duly commissioned, her bonds being procured and signed by white gentlemen—chivalrous gentlemen and just men, a State senator, an ex-State senator and president of the bank in Indianola—and during all the years, Mr. President, from the day she entered upon the discharge of the duties of that office up to the day she left it there has been no complaint lodged with the Department or communicated to the President of neglect upon her part, of incivility upon her part, of any of the "insolence of office" we find now and then in Washington and in other parts of the world in white persons who hold generally small offices. The reports of the inspectors, and the office had been repeatedly under the rules carefully inspected, failed to disclose from the beginning to the end any criticism of her. On the contrary, Mr. President, they all commend her in the highest degree for efficiency and politeness.

She had as much right under the Constitution and laws of the United States—a Federal instrumentality, discharging Federal functions within the limits of a State—to hold her office without duress, without obstruction, moral or physical, as we have, anyone of us, to sit in this Chamber and to discharge here without intimidation of any kind our duties.

I read the letter of Mr. Chapman, put in the RECORD by the Senator from Mississippi, which shows a misconception upon the part of that gentleman, from my point of view, of their relations to the Federal Government as complete as can be conceived of. A mass meeting was called. It was not a large mass meeting. I understand it was not called for the purpose of dealing with the question as to whether the postmistress should continue to discharge her duties or not. At any rate, that was not the only subject which came before the meeting. Some racial trouble had occurred there because of the alleged misdoing of a colored porter, and at that meeting the question was discussed whether a colored doctor, a Dr. Dudley, of lucrative practice, should remain there or leave.

I do not know that the proceedings are of record or were preserved; I have not seen them; but a majority of the people at that meeting said that Dr. Dudley need not leave. There was a strong minority, however, very aggressive, as I understand it and as the papers show, who insisted that he must leave, and my understanding is that, situated as he was, he took the advice of the minority. That has no connection with this subject at all except in a way and I do not intend to discuss it. I do not mention it except in its relation to this case. It shows that at that meeting, in which originated the action that was taken as to the postmistress, there was excitement, and there was, perhaps not physical threat, but moral threat as to a colored person other than this woman.

Now, what was done at that meeting? Let Mr. Chapman state:

The facts are, briefly stated, that about the 1st of October the citizens of Indianola held a meeting and appointed a committee of three to circulate a petition asking Minnie Cox to resign.

This petition was not to be presented to Minnie Cox after the signatures had been obtained. This meeting adjourned to meet again, and this petition or these petitions were to be reported at the adjourned mass meeting. She had a perfect right to resign if she wanted to. She was a voluntary agent so far as that was concerned. She had indicated no purpose to resign, but a purpose was indicated that she should resign.

This petition was to be returned at a meeting of the citizens to be held a week later. The petition was circulated and was signed by a large number of citizens of Indianola. Wayne Cox, husband of Minnie Cox, on the evening of the second meeting, called at my office and said he desired to have me state to the mass meeting—and said he desired to have me state to the mass meeting that night that he had discovered that the citizens of Indianola did not wish his wife to act as postmistress any longer, and he would therefore request that I read the inclosed resignation of his wife as postmistress to the mass meeting that night, which resignation he delivered to me.

Can any man doubt the feeling which led him to this conference with Mr. Chapman?—

The resignation was signed by his wife. The only request made in regard to the resignation was that his wife should have time.

Think of it! She was not tendering her resignation to take effect when she chose. She was not at liberty, this paper clearly shows, to define according to her will the terms of her own resignation.

The only request made in regard to the resignation was that his wife should have time—

This was to be submitted to the meeting, and it was submitted to the meeting, according to this statement; and the mass meeting which had instituted the proceeding leading to the request of those people that she should abandon her place as a Federal agent in Indianola, fixed the time when her resignation should take effect.

The only request made in regard to the resignation was that his wife should have time to get her reports ready and get the office in shape so that she might get out with a perfect settlement of the affairs with the Government.

It is due to this mass meeting that it should be stated that with chivalrous magnanimity they gave her time to settle her accounts with the Government and to abandon the office and to protect her bondsmen.

He stated further that he had been a citizen of this county for years, and that the white people were his friends and had always treated him properly, and that he and his wife did not wish to hold the office when a petition—

Not that she did not wish to hold the office—

when a petition had been freely signed by the citizens of Indianola asking for her resignation. This resignation was read to the mass meeting, as requested, THE RESIGNATION WAS ACCEPTED——

Mr. CARMACK. What is the Senator reading from?

Mr. SPOONER. I am reading from a letter from a distinguished lawyer, Mr. Chapman, which was put in the RECORD by the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN].

Mr. CARMACK. I only asked for information.

Mr. SPOONER. I know; I am giving it.

This resignation was read to the mass meeting, as requested, the resignation was accepted, and the time named for the resignation to take effect was January 1, 1903.

When before was it left to a "mass meeting" in a locality to accept a resignation of a Federal official and to fix the time—which should be fixed by the individual if at all—when the resignation should take effect?

I was present at both of the meetings and can state of my personal knowledge that no threats or intimidations were made by any party at these meetings, no committee was appointed to notify Minnie Cox, and no official representative from either of these meetings had any communications with Wayne Cox or the postmistress relative to her resignation.

Whether that was duress or not, whether the meeting itself, and the action of the meeting was a threat or not, whether it indicated the presence there of a brutal or lawless element or not, depends, Mr. President, upon the point of view. The sheriff of the county, a man whose business under the law it is to preserve the peace, to protect life and property in the community, to safeguard the rights of the people within his bailiwick from violence, was present at that meeting. He was a part of that meeting, he to whom she could look, and he only, in the community doubtless, in the event of trouble, for protection. This was put in the RECORD by the Senator from Mississippi.

The mayor of the town and the sheriff of the county both told the post-office inspector that if she refused to resign they could not be answerable for her safety, although at the same time not one word was said against her management of the office.

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi. The Senator does not undertake to state that I——

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, no; I said you put that in the RECORD.

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi. From the statement——

Mr. SPOONER. From the statement of Mr. Cortelyou.

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi. As a part of the statement of the Secretary to the President, not as my statement.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, no; I said that the Senator said this:

I have the statement, not written to me, but over the signature of the sheriff of the county, from which I quote this in reference to that point. It is under date of the 11th of this month:

"No notice of lawlessness"—

And I call attention to the fact that he does not deny in what the Senator put in the RECORD the statement of the post-office inspector that he had informed him that if this woman continued to discharge the duties of the Federal Government in that community under her commission from the President he could not be "answerable for her safety."

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi. Will the Senator allow me a question?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi. Is there anything in that to indicate that the sheriff either expressly or impliedly showed that he had any notice that it had ever been charged that he had stated he could not be answerable for her safety, or is there anything there that called for any denial by the sheriff?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not know——

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Or is there anything to show it in the statement by the inspector?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not know what this was an answer to. But this is what the sheriff says:

"No notice of lawlessness has been brought to my attention, and if there had been any I would have been the proper official to communicate with."

I infer that, although there is not very much of this letter.

"And in any event"—

Something drew out this letter; and I have evidence that the sheriff knew that it had been reported of him that he had made this statement to the inspector. I suppose, although I may be mistaken, that this letter had some reference to that.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to ask a question on a law point of the Senator from Wisconsin. Is it the duty of the sheriff to constitute himself a bodyguard of a citizen who may be threatened, or imagine that his life is in danger, or does it devolve upon him to execute the laws in arresting criminals?

Mr. SPOONER. He is the conservator of the peace up North.

Mr. TILLMAN. Do you mean that he constitutes himself a bodyguard and can guarantee that lawlessness will not occur?

Mr. SPOONER. He is not a bodyguard or guarantor; he is the conservator of the peace.

Mr. TILLMAN. How is he to know when the peace is going to be broken unless some one informs him that it is going to be broken?

Mr. SPOONER. Suppose he is walking along the street and sees that the peace is being broken?

Mr. TILLMAN. Then of course it is his duty to interfere and stop the fight or——

Mr. SPOONER. Suppose he has reason to believe that it is likely to be broken? It is his duty to guard against it.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have not found in reading of the Northern people, or of the Southern people, or of any other Anglo-Saxon people, that sheriffs are so active in running around to preserve order and quiet.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. The point to which I wanted to direct the attention of the Senator is this: The Senator has made the statement or allegation or charge that the sheriff, in the extract which I quoted from a letter from him that was published in the Memphis Morning News, did not deny that he had told the post-office inspector he could not be responsible for Minnie Cox's safety if she should return to Indianola and take charge of the office. Now, that is what I want to direct attention to. The question which I want to address to the Senator is this: Is there anything——

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator make that statement again? I was looking at a book.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. I say the Senator from Wisconsin said in substance (I can not remember the exact language) that in the extract which I put in the RECORD from the letter of the sheriff of Sunflower County, published in the Memphis Morning News, he did not deny that he had told the inspector he could not be responsible for the safety of the postmaster if she returned to take charge of the office. Now, the question I want to ask is: Does the Senator contend that there is anything in the matter to which the sheriff of Sunflower County was replying in that letter which required him to say whether or not he made the statement to the inspector that is attributed to him?

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator asked me that question some time ago, and I told him then what I must tell him now, that I have never seen the letter to which the sheriff was responding. If he was responding to any letter, I do not know whether there was anything in the letter to which he was responding which brought to his attention the charge or the allegation that he had told the inspector if this woman did not resign he would not be answerable for her safety.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Now, then, the inference drawn by the statement of the Senator, that the sheriff did not deny the charge which was made by the inspector, or the charge that was attributed to him, is that he, not having denied it, tacitly admitted it. Unless there was something in the letter or the interview to which he was replying that called for a denial from him, is it not a fact that that is not an implied admission or a tacit admission of the sheriff of the charge that is made against him?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not think so. Taken alone it might be so, but on the papers in this case I do not think so.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. The Senator, then, contends that in every instance where the sheriff is writing anything about this matter, however irrelevant it may be, he must state in that article that he never made any statement attributed to him?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not contend any such thing; but I do say the sheriff knew the post-office inspector had reported that he had said to him he would not be answerable for the safety of this officer of the Federal Government if she continued to be an officer of the Federal Government.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Then, does the Senator contend that, knowing that, in every communication of the sheriff he must be taken as tacitly admitting he made that statement unless he expressly denies it in the communication?

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, no.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. That is the point on which I wish information.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not contend that; but I contend if he knew that when he came afterwards to deal with this subject and with the question of lawlessness there, it would have been perfectly natural for him to have said something about it.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Whether the letter to which the reply was made was relevant or not?

Mr. SPOONER. Was this a reply to a private letter?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. No, sir. It was, I believe, an interview. I have not got the paper. I gave it to the Reporter when I put that extract into the RECORD.

Mr. SPOONER. He was discussing the Indianola case in the newspaper, was he not?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. He was replying to a statement that had been made by somebody else and not by the inspector. That statement had been made by somebody else. In that reply his attention was necessarily not directed to the charge of the inspector.

Mr. SPOONER. It was not to that point I was reading.

The statement continues:

"No notice of lawlessness has been brought to my attention, and if there had been any I would have been the proper official to communicate with. And in any event, regardless of color or previous condition of servitude, my services have always been at the command of the citizens of this county and State."

Why he should have said that without any motive, why he should defend himself in any way unless he had been in some way impeached, the Senator can perhaps explain. I do not undertake to do so.

"I will further state"——

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SPOONER. I will yield to the Senator later.

The statement proceeds:

"I will further state"—

And this is the real point to which I read this letter—

"I will further state that I was present at the citizens' meeting held in the court-house, and the only thing we stand charged with is that the citizens exercised their rights as American citizens to request the resignation of the postmaster. No threats were made or implied"—

That is a conclusion—

"simply a request. The Constitution gives every citizen his right to express his views on any subject."

So we have here not only the ordinary citizens composing that meeting requesting or initiating proceedings to lead to a popular demonstration by way of petition to be reported for action at an adjourned meeting, but we have the sheriff of the county, the peace officer of the county, present in that meeting and acting with it and defending it.

Now, Mr. President, was that duress or was it not? Would the woman have resigned, does the Senator say, of her own will? Did she wish to resign?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. The Senator asks me a question. I was not permitted a while ago to interrupt him, and I do not know whether he desires an answer to the question or not.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator will have time to answer, undoubtedly, but he may answer now if he prefers.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. I say she did resign the office entirely of her own free will, according to all the information I have.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course she did resign. But did she wish to resign? Would she have resigned, Mr. President, of her own free will in the absence of the pressure of this mass meeting and organized petitions? The petition was not presented to her before this second meeting was held. The very evening of it she sent her resignation by her husband, asking that it be read to the mass meeting. Such resignations are usually sent to the President of the United States to be acted upon by him. They are not usually sent to a mass meeting for its action; but this petitioner sent it to this meeting by her husband, asking that it be read to the meeting.

That was the attitude of the affair; it was an attitude of supplication. The request was addressed to a superior power, in her mind, asking that a time might be fixed by that mass meeting for her resignation to go into effect, which would enable her to close up her accounts with the Government and turn over the Government property without reponsibility to her or to her bondsmen.

It is as idle as the wind, Mr. President, to cavil upon the proposition that this was not a forced resignation. It is altogether evasive to dwell upon the "politeness" of the request for her resignation. It was the power behind it which constituted the duress; it was the fact that that power was executed by white citizens of that county, and that this person against whom it was directed was colored.

There is no arbitrary rule as to what constitutes duress. There was once, but there is not any longer, and has not been since Bouvier's time. The old strict rule of the common law, long, long ago, in the interest of humanity, disappeared; and what constitutes duress in one case does not in another. What constitutes duress? If both parties be of equal power, of equal intelligence, it does not, as a rule, constitute duress. The law takes into account, even in matters of private contract, the difference in the status and condition of the parties. The law distinguishes between the case of two strong men and the case of one strong man and one weak woman.

If it was not duress, what was it? It was the power of the community originating in this meeting, represented by petition, circulated in an organized way to bring pressure, for it constituted pressure, upon this agent of the Federal Government to quit her post of duty, not when she chose, not when the Federal Government chose, not when the President chose, but when this mass meeting chose.

Lawless! I appreciate very fully the difficulties of the situation in parts of our country, and I sympathize with it, too. I have often heard the appeal made—and I had it made to me once by a Southern Senator whom I dearly loved, and whose memory I revere as tenderly as any of his comrades of the South can revere it—whether I should like to have my wife or my daughters, if I had daughters, receiving their mail at the hands of a lascivious-eyed black man.

That is one thing; but this was a woman of stainless character, a woman of thrift and economy, a woman of self-respect, a woman whom this Senate had passed upon not once, but twice, after she had been tried in the office. Whether it was brutal or not is a matter of opinion. I have always thought it was a brutal thing, save in exceptional and extreme circumstances, for a man to strike a woman. I have always thought it a brutal thing for strength of numbers to coerce a woman. It was lawless, and from my standpoint it was brutal in the manner in which it was done and brought about, because it was an organized mass effort against a woman. Mind you, if she had been neglectful in her office, the right of petition was there. The President could have been advised.

If she had been discourteous or in any wise unfit, the good people of Indianola had their remedy. They could, at least, have petitioned the power which appointed her, which is also the power to remove her. They could, at least, have complained to the post-office inspector that the office was not conducted to their taste, but they did not; and there is not a postmaster or postmistress North or South whose record, running through the years, is cleaner for efficiency and politeness than is the record of this postmistress. There was no danger to the white women of Indianola from this colored woman.

There is a principle underlying this, Mr. President. It is a principle of the highest importance, and I will refer to it in a moment.

The Senator from Mississippi mentioned the member of Congress elect from that district. I would not have mentioned him. His letter is obviously that of an educated man, an able lawyer, and of a manly man. It bears on the point, Mr. President, whether threats, undue pressure—and any pressure would be undue under such circumstances—were brought to bear upon this woman to compel her to abandon the discharge, against her will, too, of the duties of postmistress.

This letter vindicates also the people of Indianola, as a whole, from the charge against which the Senator defended them—a charge which was not made in the statament he quoted from.

GREENVILLE, December 22, 1902.

DEAR SIR: I have conferred with several of the most prominent citizens of Indianola in reference to the post-office affair about which I spoke to you last week—

This is dated December 22, before the time fixed by this mass meeting for the taking effect of the resignation had arrived.

I have conferred with several of the most prominent citizens of Indianola in reference to the post-office affair about which I spoke to you last week, and am sorry to say I could do nothing to relieve the present strained relations.

Strained how and why? Strained because she was not fit? No. Strained because she was not a good woman? No. Strained because of any complaint? No—strained because of her color only. She had held the office for years without protest.

I am advised by some of the most influential gentlemen there that a very large proportion of the patrons of the office, while they are practically unanimous in the desire to have a white person in charge of the office, are opposed to the course which has been pursued and is still being persisted in, in insisting upon the resignation of the present incumbent.

There are some, however, though I am advised they are few in number, who express a determination not to give their asssurance that all will be well if the resignation is not accepted.

Here is a gentleman of the locality, a man of honor, a man of high professional eminence, a man trusted by the people of that district, who exculpates and vindicates the great mass of the people there from this charge, which has not been made against them, and says that they deprecate the course of this small and determined element, which I call a lawless element, and which this statement brands as a lawless element:

I have not been given any names, nor have I learned of any direct threats, but I have no doubt threats have been made.

And then he enters into——

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator tell us what he is reading?

Mr. SPOONER. I am reading from a letter addressed to the post-office inspector by the member-elect of the House of Representatives.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator might just as well give us his name.

Mr. SPOONER. His name is B. G. Humphreys. I would not have given his name if the Senator had not asked for it.

Mr. TILLMAN. The gentleman is not ashamed of anything he has written?

Mr. SPOONER. He has no occasion to be ashamed of anything he has written.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then there is no need for concealment.

Mr. SPOONER. That is the opinion of the Senator from South Carolina. I would not read all the paper, not because I am afraid to read anything here, either——

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, this is not a matter in which I am interested more than any other Southerner, and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN] is amply able to defend his people and to take care of himself and them. Therefore I do not want to have the appearance of intermeddling; but when I asked that the Senate be informed as to who was speaking I thought it was a legitimate inquiry, and I do not think there is any reason for concealment here.

Mr. SPOONER. I have not concealed anything.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator seemed to criticise my requesting light on a fact that every Senator here realizes would at least satisfy us a little better than for him to be reading from something that we did not know.

Mr. SPOONER. This gentleman makes an argument against abolition of the office, a very strong appeal against the abolition of the office. He concludes:

I am sorry I have made such a poor success as a handler of oil in these troubled waters, but the race prejudice—which is strong in us all—is running too high just now in Indianola to be checked or curbed by a simple resort to reason.

Now, I want to say to the Senator from Mississippi that he was in error when he said in his very temperate statement that the office had been abolished. The office has not been abolished. The Federal Government still has a post-office in Indianola, and the Federal Government still has a postmistress for Indianola. The President, as I understand the law, could not abolish the office, because it is an office at a county seat.

The 1st of January came, the day when this resignation was to take effect. The President, from the papers, knew that this woman had been forced to resign, that she did not wish to resign, that she had applied to the people there for leave, without disturbance, to serve out her term. Only that and nothing more.

The inspector telegraphed to Cochran, who, I think, is the chief inspector:

M. L. Cox, postmaster, Indianola, Miss., wires: "Have been told by reliable parties that I am not permitted to open post-office here." Full report is before Department. Please advise me what we should attempt to do. Without instructions we might possibly pursue course other than that deemed desirable.

What was done? The President refused to have a Federal office, held by a competent person, vacated against her will and under duress by local pressure, and, as the people there had closed the office to all intents and purposes, he declined to accept the resignation; and in doing that, Mr. President, he acted upon a principle absolutely essential to the virility and strength of the National Government.

It presented itself to him, as it will present itself to thoughtful men everywhere who are unbiased, as vital to the Government of the United States that it shall be permitted to transact the Government business, to protect the Government property through such agencies in the States as the Government selects in the constitutional way, without consent or interference locally—and I will deal with that briefly in a moment. It is that principle, Mr. President, which underlies the action of the President and upon which I have justified his action, because, whatever else the Senator may think the President was misinformed about, he was not misinformed upon the proposition that this woman did not wish to resign; that she desired to serve out her term of office, and that she would have done that if she had been permitted.

I think part of this difficulty arose from the fact that some white gentleman in the community conceived the idea that if this woman could be gotten out of the office one of them would be appointed to it.

Here is a letter, signed by Mr. A. B. Weeks, dated Indianola, September 19, 1902, which throws some light upon the situation and the determination, long in advance of this meeting, to force this postmistress out of the discharge of those duties:

THE FOURTH ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: There is a determined effort of the people of this town to make the present postmistress resign or give up the office in some way. They only do this because she is colored. I do not indorse—

The post-office inspector names him as one of the chief instigators and agitators to the end that this woman be forced out.

I do not indorse, and shall not take any hand in it, as I would be powerless to defend her against the whole town and community.

This is the partner of the mayor.

They will be satisfied—

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator inform us whether there is anything there to show, or if he knows, the complexion of the politics of that man?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; I will tell the Senator what it is in a minute. I think he has always been a Democrat.

Mr. TILLMAN. A Gold Democrat, a commercial Democrat?

Mr. SPOONER. No; an honest-money Democrat.

Mr. TILLMAN. A Democrat who would start toward the Republican party if he could get a job? [Laughter.]

Mr. SPOONER. A Jackson Democrat; not any other kind of a Democrat.

They will be satisfied with my appointment or any other white person's appointment, but they do not want a colored person in the office. I hope the excitement will blow over—but if it does not, I will be glad for you to remember my application for the office.

This was on September 19—

[Laughter.]

Mr. BERRY. Does the Senator think that an honest man?

Mr. SPOONER. I think the letter shows, for he is a prominent man there. I did not say "an honest man." I do not know anything against his honesty. I said he was an honest-money Democrat, from my standpoint, and I presume——

Mr. TILLMAN. And a Jackson Democrat?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes, a Jackson Democrat; and I presume the Senator would not impugn the honesty of a Democrat because he was a Gold Democrat or because, as my friend from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] says, he wanted an office.

Mr. BERRY. Under a Republican administration.

Mr. SPOONER. The letter continues:

You will do me quite a favor if you will put my application before the President, as I think that he has to appoint the postmaster at this place. Anything that you will do for me will be very much appreciated.

Yours, very truly,

A. B. WEEKS.

I made application for appointment to this office about four months ago.

Mind you, this woman had yet a year to serve. He knew that, and they all knew that. Here is another letter.

J. L. Davis.

That is the mayor.

A. B. Weeks.

That is this gentleman.

Office of Davis & Weeks, real estate agents. Indianola——

Mr. TILLMAN. Is he a man of the same stripe—a Gold Democrat? Is this man from whom you are going to read of the same stripe?

Mr. SPOONER. The same man and of the same type.

Mr. TILLMAN. You said you were going to read the mayor's letter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators must rise in their places when they address the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then I will rise and repeat my question.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from South Carolina has not addressed the Chair.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, it is always pleasant to be taught by my distinguished friend, because he does it in such a nice way, and then he is so capable of teaching.

I desire to ask the Senator now, in an orderly manner and according to the rules, whether or not the man from whom he is about to read is a man of the same type as the writer of the letter he just read?

Mr. SPOONER. It is from a man of the same type, because it is from the same man. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. I understood the Senator, as I think the RECORD will show——

Mr. SPOONER. No. If my friend will permit me, I read the letter head——

Mr. TILLMAN. And I——

Mr. SPOONER. Which is "Davis & Weeks," and I said Davis is the partner of Weeks.

Mr. TILLMAN. You are going to read from him?

Mr. SPOONER. I am not going to read from him.

Mr. TILLMAN. You read from Weeks's letter a moment ago?

Mr. SPOONER. I am going to read from Weeks's letter now.

Mr. TILLMAN. I must have misunderstood the Senator, because I understood him to say this was from the mayor, and he had previously stated that Weeks is the partner of the mayor.

Mr. SPOONER. Now, Mr. President, I will correct that by saying, for the information of the Senator, that Weeks is a partner of the mayor. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator is not going to quote the mayor now. He is going to quote Weeks now.

Mr. SPOONER. Weeks.

Mr. TILLMAN. All right. We will hear from Mr. Weeks.

Mr. SPOONER. The firm is Davis & Weeks. Davis is the mayor and Weeks is the man who wants this office.

Mr. TILLMAN. So we understood. Has the Senator a letter from the mayor?

Mr. SPOONER. I will talk about the mayor in a minute, if the Senator wants me to.

This letter is dated "Indianola, Miss., December 19, 1902." It is a funny letter from my standpoint:

His Excellency President THEODORE ROOSEVELT, Washington, D. C.

ESTEEMED SIR: I hope you will bear with me, but as the time draws near for Mrs. Minnie M. Cox's resignation to take effect—

Fixed by the mass meeting—

as postmistress at this place, I am anxious about the matter, as I want the office. I know that I am the only good friend your Administration has here among the white people, and I feel sure that if you will investigate the matter you will be sure to appoint me. I conscientiously think—

He is a man of ability. The letter shows that—

I conscientiously think that the Republican party is the party for the farmers of the country—and I further think that when that party is in power, these who are Republicans should hold the offices, but I will frankly say that, should I not get the appointment, I will still be a good Republican and will feel unkind toward no one. I hope that you will give this matter your kind consideration, and give me the appointment. With great respect, I am,

[Laughter.]

Yours, very obediently,

A. B. WEEKS.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I thought the Senator from Wisconsin said a moment ago, on his own responsibility, that this is a sound-money Democrat. How could he say that when he had the confession of the man or the statement or the claim that he is a Republican?

Mr. SPOONER. I have known sound-money Democrats who got to be Republicans.

Mr. TILLMAN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SPOONER. Now, Mr. President, here is a letter from J. L. Davis, the mayor, dated the eleventh month, 29, 1902.

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi. I did not catch that. As I have never myself had an opportunity to see these letters, although I requested permission to see them, I would be glad if the Senator would read that, so that I can catch the date.

Mr. SPOONER. The eleventh month, twenty-ninth day, the year of our Lord 1902.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Thank you.

Mr. SPOONER. It is as follows:

INDIANOLA, MISS., November 29, 1902.

Hon. CHARLES FITZGERALD,
Post-Office Inspector, Jackson, Miss.

DEAR SIR: I acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 23d, and in reply will say that I know of no parties, citizens or others, who "have banded together and intimidated Minnie M. Cox"—

This is quoted, I suppose, from Fitzgerald's letter to him—to resign to take effect the 1st of January, 1903. I have been informed that there is a sentiment in the community that a change should be made in the post-office management, and that when this fact became known to Minnie M. Cox she, through her husband, offered to tender her resignation to take effect on January 1, 1903. I have never seen any paper purporting to be her resignation, or an offer to resign, and do not know of my own knowledge that such a proposition was made by her or her husband, but my impression is that she made the proposition to anticipate any action of the citizens looking to her resignation and without any special pressure or request from the citizens of the town. I will say further, in this connection, that it meets the wishes and approval of a vast majority of the citizens and patrons of the office that she resign, as I understand that she has agreed to do.

Minnie M. Cox has been postmistress here under the Harrison, McKinley, and Roosevelt Administrations, and the white people of the town and community have heretofore given her their support, have made her bonds, etc., but for various reasons they think the time has come when a change would be preferable; at least, that is the idea I gather from my contact with the citizens of the town and patrons of the office generally.

Considering the fact that fully five-sixths of the mail handled by the post-office at this place is sent and received by the white patrons of the office, it strikes me that the people have acted in a very exemplary manner to this time; and considering the further fact that she has acted as postmistress for years, and that she as postmistress and her husband as mail clerk have made money, and are now in easy circumstances, and that she finds the people and patrons generally desire a change in the administration, it seems to me that it is the part of wisdom on her part and the best way out of any unpleasant outcome of the matter for her to resign, as it seems that she has agreed to do.

I have freely expressed myself to you, not that I know the matters suggested herein to be facts, but that because I, as mayor of Indianola, very much prefer to have no unpleasant affairs to deal with, and because of the further fact that I think her resignation is desired by nearly every patron of the office.

Very truly, yours, J. L. DAVIS, Mayor.

No man can read that letter without seeing clearly in it by implication, Mr. President—it need not be sought, it need not be looked for—the opinion of the mayor that if she did not resign there would be an unpleasant situation for the mayor to deal with. What would the mayor, as mayor, have to do with the post-office, with the resignation of this woman? He might be invoked in case of unpleasantness. What sort of "unpleasantness" could the mayor have on his hands in that connection unless it be lawlessness? And that letter confirms clearly to my mind, Mr. President, the statement of the inspector that the mayor told him that if this woman did not resign from the office he could not be answerable for her safety.

I read an extract from the report by the inspector.

JANUARY 6, 1903.

He is a fearless man, and I do not think his honesty is challenged.

While I was treated with the utmost courtesy by the people last Sunday when I returned to Indianola——

Mr. COCKRELL. From what is the Senator reading?

Mr. SPOONER. I am reading from the report of the inspector, Mr. Fitzgerald.

While I was treated with the utmost courtesy by the people last Sunday when I returned to Indianola, yet I had an experience that I have not been able to understand. I got to Indianola at dark Sunday evening and went direct to the hotel, where I had been but a short time when I was called to the telephone. I did not recognize the voice of my caller, who said he was A. B. Weeks (brother-in-law of Mayor Davis and candidate for postmaster).

He said: "Mr. Fitzgerald, if you have trouble here to-night and need a friend, call on me." I thanked the speaker and assured him I apprehended no trouble. Later Sheriff Cox called me over the 'phone and invited me to come to his house, as he wanted to see me. I thought this a remarkable request, especially when the trip would involve a lonely walk of half a mile in the dark. Cox asked me if he could send a conveyance for me, and I replied, "No, I thank you; I will walk."

While engaged in the conversation at the 'phone a gentleman came in the room and asked of me, "Is this Mr. Fitzgerald?" saying, "My name is Richardson," editor of a local paper, and reminding me of a previous meeting at the home of a mutual friend in this city (Vicksburg) last summer. He says, "I heard from your conversation just now at the 'phone that you are going out to the sheriff's," and expressed a desire to accompany me and talk to me, to which I assented. We reached Cox's home and were met at the door by Cox, who showed some surprise at Richardson's presence, not, however, by word so much as manner.

We were ushered into a room where we found awaiting us Mayor Davis and his brother-in-law, A. B. Weeks, who earlier in the evening offered his aid in case of trouble. After entering the room an awkward silence followed, which was finally broken by the sheriff, who said: "To get down to business, Mr. Fitzgerald, the statement of our post-office troubles sent out from Washington quotes you as saying that the sheriff and the mayor advised you that if the postmistress continued in office after January 1 they could not be answerable for her personal safety. Did you make this statement in your report?"

I promptly replied, "Yes, sir; I made that statement, and correctly quoted you and Mr. Davis, as each of you most assuredly gave me that information." I turned to the mayor and repeated this assertion and ceased speaking. Another period of silence followed, which was broken by the sheriff, who admitted that I had correctly reported him, whereupon I turned to the mayor and said pleasantly, but firmly, "And you, too, Mr. Davis." Throughout the interview Davis never once affirmed or denied my claim of having quoted him correctly. After this there was a brief exchange of pleasant words, and I bowed myself out of the room, accompanied by Mr. Richardson, who proposed to walk back to the hotel with me.

Mr. President, I hope I am not biased about this matter. I wish there was no question of color involved in it, because what stirs me about it, and it would just as much stir me wherever it happened, is the principle which is involved in it. It is not the matter of mere justice to this postmistress, but it is the right of the Government of the United States, acting within its constitutional jurisdiction, to execute its laws and administer its affairs through agencies of its own everywhere throughout its jurisdiction and where its flag floats without obstruction and without local duress applied to its officials.

The President of the United States, as clearly informed as ever a man was informed of anything by the papers that this woman, who had made a good official, having yet a year to serve, did not desire to resign, but had been forced to resign, had to answer to himself and to his oath this question: Shall I leave a lawless element in that community to force an agent of the United States to resign, to interrupt her in the discharge of purely Federal functions, or shall I refuse to accept her resignation, maintain there the post-office, the property of the United States, keep on the rolls this competent postmistress, and as they have closed that post-office allow it to remain closed until the law-abiding element of Indianola will permit this agent of the United States to discharge the functions of the United States in their midst?

I thank God that the President of the United States saw his way clear, Mr. President, and I hope it will not be dimmed in any future case, to maintain the right of the Government of the United States to maintain its functions within the States by agencies chosen by the President and the Senate, not by local "mass meetings." If any other rule than that should prevail, if the President departed in this instance from the high principle which in the interest of all of us should be observed, what would be the result; where would it stop? If it is permitted to succeed in this case, it will in others. If it may be done in the South, it may in the North. Every successful impairment of the national faculties breeds others. There is but one safe way, and that is to permit not one to succeed. I know the President will be as insistent as anyone who has ever occupied the office that officials shall discharge with courtesy, with propriety, with fidelity the duties of their respective offices.

I know he will listen with keen interest to complaints coming from localities as to the fitness and efficiency of Government appointees. But where the records of the Government show that through nine years an official has been a faithful and efficient agent, courteous, kindly, often commended, with no official criticism upon her, with no local complaint of her registered, and that she has been forced by a community to resign, I hope the President will not accept the resignation; and if that leads to closing the post-office, if that leads to a deprivation of a locality of postal facilities, that they may undergo that inconvenience until the people regain their sense of law and of what is due to the National Government, and notify the authorities that they will protect this Federal agent in the discharge of Federal duties.

Mr. President, this question has been settled, and it ought never to be permitted by any President of the United States to be in the slightest degree unsettled. The war was fought on that principle. The technical ground upon which the war was carried on was the right of the Federal Government to enforce its laws and to protect its property and to carry on governmental business all over the United States, and without the consent of States as organized sovereignties or of localities. It was in support of that principle that our armies in the civil war were organized, that the battles of that war were fought. It was upon that principle that General Dix issued his order which thrilled the country, applying to a flag floating above a ship belonging to the United States, "If anyone attempts to haul down the American flag, shoot him on the spot." It is the law which the Supreme Court of the United States, quoting from Chief Justice Marshall—essential to the perpetuity and virility of government—applied in the Debs case, and that is the law applicable in this case, 158 U. S., 568.

The court say, quoting, with approval, from Chief Justice Marshall:

No trace is to be found in the Constitution of an intention to create a dependence of the Government of the Union on those of the States for the execution of the great powers assigned to it. Its means are adequate to its ends, and on those means alone was it expected to rely for the accomplishment of its ends.

To impose on it the necessity of resorting to means which it can not control, which another government may furnish or withhold, would render its course precarious, the result of its measures uncertain, and create dependence on other governments, which might disappoint its most important designs, and is incompatible with the language of the Consitution. (McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U. S.) * * *

We hold it to be an incontrovertible principle that the Government of the United States may, by means of physical force exercised through its official agents, execute on every foot of American soil the powers and functions which belong to it.

This is vital, and if the Government is not dependent upon the consent of States to the exercise of governmental functions, how much less is it dependent upon the consent of the people of towns, villages, and cities?

Is it to be admitted for a moment or permitted for a moment that the people of a village or city may close a post-office established and officered under the Constitution and laws of the United States by forcing the agent of the Government to quit because they do not like that agent? Is the conduct of a post-office by the General Government to be made to depend upon the approval by the patrons of the agent chosen by the Government?

May the choice of a postmaster or a marshal or district attorney be taken practically from the President and the Senate and made to depend upon the dictation of the people of a locality? And if one postmaster, chosen by the President and Senate, may be forced to quit and a successor appointed, why may not one successor after another be forced to resign until one satisfactory to the locality shall have been chosen?

And then who, in fact, will have appointed the official?

The Federal agent must be appointed by the constitutional methods, and obstructions in any way in the discharge of Federal functions by localities can not be permitted.

This principle, so essential to the existence and efficiency of the National Government, has cost too much of life and blood and treasure and is too well seated to render tolerable any violations of it anywhere for a moment.

Here is a post-office. Under the Constitution Congress establishes post-offices and post-roads. The sign of the sovereignty of the Federal Government in Indianola is the post-office. That is the one place, Mr. President, where the flag of the United States has a right to float as testimony that it is in possession of the United States and subject alone to its jurisdiction; and if the agencies of the United States are to be carried on or obstructed in a State at the wish, caprice, whim, or because of hatred or excitement of individuals or masses, what becomes of the Government as a government of power and a government of law? What becomes of the President sworn to support the Constitution of the United States and to take care that the laws be faithfully executed?

Now, that is the principle which underlies this case. I am sorry the trouble occurred. I hope and believe that if it were to be done again it would not occur; but I hope the President of the United States will not accept the resignation of Mrs. Cox. I hope he will leave the situation there where the people leave it—with a post-office and an agent of the United States ready and willing to discharge the duties of postmaster or postmistress—until the people of that community give their assurance that that agent of the United States shall be protected from themselves.

The President, I suppose, would have the right to protect that postmistress in the discharge of her duties. I do not think he is called upon to do that thing in order to force upon the people of a community facilities which primarily, perhaps, are created and afforded for their convenience.

That is all I want to say about the Indianola case at this time, Mr. President. I should like to pursue it, but there is not time. I justify absolutely the Postmaster-General and the President in the action which has been taken.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Mr. President, on the 15th of this month I took occasion in this body, not to assail the President or the Postmaster-General for closing a post-office in the State of Mississippi, at a county town, where some fifteen hundred or two thousand people live, a prosperous community, a law-abiding people, but to refute a charge that had been made by the President's secretary, and stated to be for the President, that the people of that town were a lawless and brutal element. I did not discuss the propriety or the impropriety of the President's action in closing the post-office, for it is the President's action and not the action of the Postmaster-General. I did not feel called upon to discuss it, because I did not feel that its discussion was necessary to a vindication of the people of that community, who are my constituents.

I stated at that time, however, in response to a question from the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] that if it was desired to pursue the indictment made by the President's secretary for the President against that community I should always be ready, in my humble way, to respond to it. There is nothing I have said that could have elicited the arraignment of the people of that community, and virtually of the people of the entire State of Mississippi, by the Senator from Wisconsin.

I read an extract which was exceedingly objectionable to me, because it was on the people of Indianola and of the entire State. Then I read the evidence in my possession to refute that.

I had not had access, as the Senator has had, to the correspondence of the President and the Postmaster-General. The people of Indianola have not had access to it. They could not tell upon what the charges that had been made against them were predicated. They could only tell, and I could only tell, that a statement had gone out to the people of the United States and to the people of the world, with all the force and effect of the utterance of the private secretary of the President of the United States, making charges against those people. And to-day for the first time I have heard some of the evidence read upon which the charge against those people was made and upon which the office at Indianola was abolished.

Now, I propose in my plain and simple way to present to the Senate the case of those people and the people of Mississippi, because the entire State sympathizes with those people. While "I am no orator, as Brutus is," I feel that the mere statement of facts, without any declamation and without any oratory, is sufficient to justify those people in their indignation. It is not against the President, because the people of that community as a rule believe that the President has been misinformed, that he has acted hastily and upon impulse in this matter, but against those who have given him information upon which to predicate any such charge. Mark you, there has not been an iota of testimony, an iota of information contained in anything said by the Senator from Wisconsin, upon which it can be charged with any degree of fairness or with any degree of justice that the people of Indianola have, or that any single individual among the people of Indianola has, made any threat of violence or any other threat against the postmaster.

There is nothing to show that there is not the best of feeling between the people of Indianola and the postmaster, taking into consideration the racial distinction between them. That they do not want a colored postmaster there I admit and they admit. That they have their race prejudice they admit and I admit. That it is a race prejudice which exists all over the South there can be no denial; aye, that it exists all over the North, all over this country, there can be no denial. There may be some few isolated cases here and there where the race prejudice does not exist, but in every section of this country, I do not care in what section, the feeling of race prejudice does exist.

The Senator has said that he does not intend to discuss the race question or the race problem. This matter can not be presented to the Senate without discussing it. It is involved at the very threshold of this discussion. Because of the racial distinction, because of the fact that the white people of that community and the white people of Mississippi do not want negro postmasters appointed to give them out their mail, arises this trouble, not from any lawlessness on the part of those people. They have gone about the attempt to rid themselves of this disagreeable situation in a lawful manner. They have done what they thought they had a right to do, and what they feel now and what they ever will feel they have a right to do. They have petitioned a portion of the Government for the redress of what they conceive to be their grievances, a right that is not only a natural right, but a right that we are guaranteed shall never be abridged by any act of the Congress of the United States. We are assured of that by the Constitution.

There has been no lawless act. There is nothing that has been shown here by the President, by the Senator from Wisconsin, by the inspector, or by any evidence the Senator has read to show that there has been a single lawless act by anybody. It is true that some man who had gone over to the Republican party and now extols the principles and policies of that party had applied for this office, and the Senator created some levity by reading a letter of that man, not a member of my party, according to his own confession and his own statement, but a member of the Senator's party, who is seeking to get office under the present Administration, and, as he claims, and I suppose justly, extols the present Administration because he thinks that the adulation of the Administration is the best means of conducting him into office.

Now, let us get at the very threshold of this business. The secretary of the President says that—

> The postmaster recently forwarded her resignation to take effect on January 1, but the report of the inspectors and information received from various reputable white citizens of the town and neighborhood show that the resignation was forced by a brutal and lawless element purely upon the ground of her color, and was obtained under terror of threats of physical violence.

This is the indictment he proposes to prosecute. This is the indictment to a prosecution upon which I said I wanted to respond, and would respond, if the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] desired to prosecute it. The charge is not a moral duress, but that her resignation was forced by reason of threats of terror of violence.

I have never heard it said in the Senate Chamber before, and I had never thought that it would come to the point where it would be proclaimed by a Senator from his seat in the Senate Chamber of the United States, that the people have no right to lawfully assemble and peaceably petition for a redress of their grievances.

They say, too, that it gives this woman to understand she was not wanted in this office. That was just exactly the motive they had in presenting the petition to her, or at least if they had ever presented the petition to her, the motive they had in doing so would have been to show that she was not wanted there. It does not make any difference whether it was because of her color, or from whatever cause. The fact is, the people of that community did not want her there, and they had a right to say so, and they had a right to say it to her. They had a right to say it to the President of the United States. They were not confined in their right to say it to anybody, and they were preparing to say it to her when she sent in her resignation.

She had been there on friendly terms with our people. Their relations had been friendly, as that of a negro postmaster with a lot of white people who had prejudices on account of their race. The negroes have their race prejudices as well as we do. They stand by the negro and we stand by the white man, when it comes to a contest between the negro and the white man.

They presented the petition to her, or were prepared to present the petition to her, and not to the President of the United States. It was their privilege to present it to her first, and see if she would resign without any charge being brought against her before the Post-Office Department, and if she did not resign, and if they thought proper to do so, they would present it to the President of the United States. That was a matter within their discretion. That was a right which they had, and they went about it in a peaceable way.

As I have said, I never expected to hear it stated in the Senate of the United States that the people did not have a right to peaceably assemble and consult about their business affairs in a lawful way. I remember meeting last year a man from Kentucky who alleged that the assassin of Goebel was justified in assassinating him because he had contested the election of his opponent in the election the previous year; that Goebel had no right to contest it. I remember, when I put the proposition to him that Goebel was acting according to the laws of the State of Kentucky in a peaceable and lawful way to contest his right as any other litigant would do, he contended that he had no legal or moral right to present his case to the legislature of the State of Kentucky that they might decide it.

I was astonished that a man should make such a proposition as that. But it did not astonish me as it does that the proposition shall be made in the Senate of the United States, by a learned Senator—than whom there is no better lawyer, than whom there is no abler Senator in this Chamber—that any people in this country, when they from any cause desire the removal of a postmaster or any other official, have no right to present their petition to her or to hold a mass meeting to see whether they can have a consensus of opinion in the steps they were about to take, and lawful steps at that, to procure her removal.

I remember this question of the right of petition in a case which came up from the State of Louisiana (United States v. Cruikshank, U. S. Reports, vol. 92, pp. 552 and 553). Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court on the question. He said:

> The right of the people peaceably to assemble for the purpose of petitioning Congress for a redress of grievances, or for anything else connected with the powers or the duties of the National Government, is an attribute of national citizenship, and, as such, under the protection of and guaranteed by the United States. The very idea of a government, republican in form, implies a right on the part of its citizens to meet peaceably for consultation in respect to public affairs and to petition for a redress of grievances.

Mark you, to meet peaceably for consultation in respect to public affairs. Did these people do anything else? Has there been any pretense by anybody, by the report of the inspector, by the letter that has been read, by anything that has been said by the Senator from Wisconsin or by the President of the United States or the Postmaster-General, that these people did not meet peaceably for consultation in respect to public affairs? Is not the office where they get their mail a matter of public affairs to them? And yet it is pretended that if they do that they are outraging a postmaster whom they do not want in the post-office; that they are bringing to bear duress upon her; that it is a strong man against a woman. It is the community who asked for the resignation, and it was given voluntarily and freely, without any compulsion and without any duress from anybody, and there is no pretense of anything done that can be tortured into duress.

I know that Senators can rise upon this floor, make inflammatory speeches, and denounce the people of any community. When they denounce the people of the community of Indianola they denounce the entire people of the State of Mississippi, for all the people of Mississippi have the same views on this question. I know that Senators can predicate their charges upon facts that are not in existence, and of which there is not the least scintilla of evidence, but they can not change the right of every American community—even the people of Mississippi—to meet peaceably for consultation in respect to public affairs, even if the public affairs concern the post-office and postmaster at Indianola, Miss. The court proceeds:

> If it had been alleged in these counts that the object of the defendants was to prevent a meeting for such a purpose, the case would have been within the statute and within the scope of the sovereignty of the United States. Such, however, is not the case. The offense, as stated in the indictment, will be made out if it be shown that the object of the conspiracy was to prevent a meeting for any lawful purpose whatever.

It would be an offense to undertake to prevent the people of any community in these States from meeting peaceably for consultation about their public affairs; and that is all the people of Indianola have done.

Now, because they did that, and because they appointed a committee of three persons to draw up a petition addressed to the postmaster asking her to resign, and a respectful petition it was, they are denounced as a lawless, brutal element.

I want to call the attention of the Senate to one thing as I go along, as a fact, so that it can be appreciated. About 75 per cent of the people of Indianola are negroes and 25 per cent white people. About 90 per cent of the taxes paid are paid by white people and about 10 per cent by negroes. About five-sixths of the mail of that office is mail of white people. I want to get that fact before the Senate so that Senators may see the pertinency and reasonableness of the petition. It is a petition gotten up, never presented, but intended to have been presented.

Here it is; I will read it:

INDIANOLA, MISS., September 19, 1902.

To M. M. COX, Postmistress of Indianola, Miss.:

We, the undersigned, hereby request that you tender your resignation as postmistress of the Indianola office, to take effect on the 1st day of November, 1902.

This is a copy, certified to by the clerk:

STATE OF MISSISSIPPI, Sunflower County:

I, W. P. Gresham, chancery clerk and ex officio notary public in and for the county and State aforesaid, certify that the foregoing petition, or request, is a true and correct copy of the petition, or request, prepared on the day and date written and signed on the day and date above named, for the purpose of presenting to the postmaster at this place, asking for her resignation.

Witness my signature this the 21st day of January, A. D. 1903.

[SEAL.] W. P. GRESHAM,
Chancery Clerk.

STATE OF MISSISSIPPI, Sunflower County:

I, W. D. Watts, circuit clerk and ex officio notary public in and for the county and State aforesaid, hereby certify that W. P. Gresham, who has certified to the correctness of the petition to which this certificate is attached, is the chancery clerk and ex officio notary public in and for the county and State aforesaid.

Witness my hand and seal of office this the 21st day of January, A. D. 1903.

[SEAL.] W. D. WATTS.
Circuit Clerk.

That is the gravamen of the offense. This petition was prepared, but never presented to Minnie Cox. It was prepared for presentation to her.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. How many signatures are attached to that petition?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. There are 49 to this one. There were probably some other petitions, but there are only 49 signatures to this one.

As I was going to say a while ago, which escaped my attention just then, 75 per cent of the population are negroes. The town has some 1,500 or 2,000 inhabitants in it. I think there are 85 white people. On the first day of the mass meeting there were 53 white men in the meeting; at the second meeting there were 85. My information is that every single, solitary man in the town was in the second meeting, except perhaps Mr. A. B. Weeks, who has gone over to the Republican party for the purpose of getting the office, like most of the men of the South who are in the Republican party have done. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLAY. In Mississippi?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Yes, sir; and I suppose in Georgia.

Now, at this first meeting this committee was appointed to get signatures to the petition to be presented to Minnie Cox before the next meeting. Before it ever was presented to her and before there was ever any communication with her by any man authorized to speak for that mass meeting her husband presented to Mr. Chapman the resignation of Minnie Cox, to be tendered and read to the mass meeting, just one week after the first mass meeting.

Now, there has been a great deal said by the Senator from Wisconsin about her tendering the resignation to the mass meeting instead of tendering it to the President of the United States. Surely the people of Indianola are not responsible for that, and I am not responsible for it. She selected the people to whom she would present the resignation. It was a matter of her own choice. These people did not want her and she knew it. The negotiations were between her and them, and she asked that they make it the 1st day of January, 1903, instead of the 1st day of November, 1902.

In this connection I will read the affidavit of P. C. Chapman and statements of others. It is as follows:

STATE OF MISSISSIPPI,
Sunflower County, Town of Indianola:

This day personally appeared before me, W. P. Gresham, clerk of the chancery court in and for the county and State aforesaid, P. C. Chapman, who, being sworn, says that he has been a citizen of the town of Indianola and county of Sunflower since October, 1887. That he is personally acquainted with each and every man in the town of Indianola. That to the best of his knowledge, information, and belief that no person in the county of Sunflower or in the town of Indianola has ever demanded the resignation of Minnie Cox as postmaster at this place, and affiant further states that no committee, either in person or by petition presented to the said Minnie Cox, ever requested her resignation as postmaster of Indianola office; would further state that no force, threats, or intimidating methods were used by the people of Indianola against the said Minnie Cox in forcing her resignation as postmaster. Affiant further states of his own personal knowledge that Wayne Cox came in person to affiant's office on the evening of the meeting of the citizens held that night and stated that he had learned that a petition requesting the resignation of Minnie Cox as postmaster at Indianola was being circulated; that he desired that this resignation should be read to the people that night, for the reason that he had been a citizen of this community for years and he was not willing for his wife, Minnie Cox, to hold the office after he had learned that a majority of the citizens desired her resignation. Affiant would further state that the said Wayne Cox handed to him the resignation of his wife, Minnie Cox, which was read at said meeting.

Affiant would further state that from his best knowledge, information, and belief that this resignation was tendered voluntarily and without any fear or threat or intimidation, as she voluntarily notified the people of Indianola in a public assembly that since it was the wish of the people that she should no longer hold the position of postmaster, that she would tender her resignation, to take effect on the 1st day of January, A. D. 1903.

P. C. CHAPMAN.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 21st day of January, A. D. 1903.
[SEAL.] W. P. GRESHAM, Chancery Clerk.

I heartily indorse the above statement by Hon. P. C. Chapman in full as the whole truth.

J. W. WELCH, County Treasurer.

Substantiated by—[SEAL.] W. D. WATTS, Circuit Clerk.

We indorse the above statement made by P. C. Chapman as a true statement of the facts.

W. T. Pitts, cashier Bank of Indianola; J. L. Davis, mayor; A. E. Andersen, jr., ex-sheriff; A. C. Cox, sheriff; R. P. Miller, ex-sheriff; W. E. Chapman, editor and notary; D. M. Quinn, county superintendent of education; W. P. Gresham, chancery clerk; C. P. Adair, editor Sunflower Penser.

It is said that that very request from her indicates that she did this under duress, because why should she ask them to make it the 1st day of January instead of the 1st day of November, 1902? It is the most simple thing in the world. She was negotiating with them. She wanted to settle the affairs of her office. She did not want to hold it in opposition to the wishes of the white people of Indianola, the people who get their mail there, and she wanted to agree upon a time that would be satisfactory to them as well as to her, because she did not want to hold it in opposition to their wishes. She wanted to consult them with reference to the time when it was satisfactory to them for her resignation to take effect.

I now read the affidavit of D. M. Quinn:

Personally appeared before me, W. D. Watts, clerk of the circuit court of the county of Sunflower and State of Mississippi, D. M. Quinn, who, after having been duly sworn, makes the following statement under oath, to wit: That he was present at the two meetings of citizens of Indianola in said county, held at the court-house during the month of September, 1902; that said meetings were orderly and composed of the best law-abiding citizens of said town, and that neither of said meetings took any action demanding the resignation of Minnie Cox, the postmistress of said town, or to intimidate her in any way; said meetings took no action relative to the resignation of Minnie Cox except to carry by an affirmative vote a motion requesting that she resign the office of postmistress; that a petition was circulated among the citizens of the town, which contained a request that the postmistress resign, but states further to the best of his knowledge and belief that said petition was never presented to either Minnie Cox, the postmistress, or her husband, and no one was authorized by either of said meetings to carry any request to the postmistress or in any way make known to her the wishes of said meeting that she resign the office. He further states on information and belief that the postmistress resigned for the reason that she became aware of the fact that a majority of the patrons of the office desired her to do so, and not by reason of any threats of violence or intimidation from any source.

D. M. QUINN.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 21st day of January, A. D. 1903.
[SEAL.] W. D. WATTS,
Clerk of the Circuit Court of said County.

There was a treaty between Great Britain and this country, and an extra session of the Senate was called for its consideration. In that treaty I suppose many propositions and counter propositions were made between the Secretary of State of the United States and the premier of Great Britain. It could not be said that because one made a proposition to the other and asked that such and such be done he was doing it under duress, or that the other who accepted it was accepting it under duress.

There is no doubt and no denial of the proposition that Indianola wanted Minnie Cox out of the office because of her color. They did not want to resort, and did not resort, to any illegal means or any violent means to get her out, but they resorted to that peaceable means which they thought would be effective to get her out.

As I said, the race distinction exists. There can not be any denial of that. It exists all over this country. Many years ago, more than a century ago, the people of this country, commencing in the North—in New England—went to Africa and brought here from barbarism and from cannibalism an inferior race of people. That race of people have lived here ever since. Our people have regarded them all over the country as an inferior race of people. It does not follow, however, as is charged by the Senator from Wisconsin, that there is any hate between the white people and negroes. There certainly is not in our section of the country. In the State of Mississippi there certainly is none. So the Senator is mistaken——

Mr. SPOONER. I did not say that.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. The Senator referred to the hate of those people against the colored race.

Mr. SPOONER. I was speaking generally. I did not refer to any particular locality in the United States.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Now, the colored people, as I said, were elevated from a condition of barbarism and cannibalism to a condition of slavery. They were an inferior race. It was a blessing to the negro race and a curse to the white race in the United States.

There is the friendliest feeling existing in the State of Mississippi between the negroes and the white people. Nevertheless, it is recognized there that they are an inferior race. It is recognized by the negro race themselves. All over this country men boast of having in their veins Scotch blood, Welsh blood, English blood, Irish blood, German blood, Italian blood, Spanish blood, French blood, Portuguese blood. Who ever heard of a man boasting that he had within his veins negro blood? This prejudice, I do not mean ill feeling, but race distinction, exists in the Senator's section as it does in my section. It exists in the Senator's State as well as it does in my State. I do not say that there is any ill feeling, but race distinction. We want to build up the negro. We send him to school in the State of Mississippi.

I venture the assertion that in no other State, especially in no State in the North, are as many negro children sent to the common schools of the State, supported from a common fund appropriated out of the State treasury, as are sent in the State of Mississippi to our common schools, supported by appropriations from our State treasury. We send 25 per cent more colored children to our schools than we do white children. We send them the same length of time that we do our white children. We support a college in our State for the higher education of the negroes, both male and female. Nevertheless it does not follow that there is anybody there who believes that the white race is not superior to the negro race. It is not a condition of our making. It is a condition that came down to us from the plastic hand of the Almighty himself and has existed ever since, and it is likely to exist as long as time shall last. It is a condition, as I have said, for which we are not responsible.

I say to the Senator who prosecutes this charge against the people of Indianola—because it is against the entire people of Indianola—that the entire people of Indianola have been guilty of trying to get this woman out of office peaceably and not unlawfully. Not only so, but the entire people of Mississippi sympathize with them in it, as one labor union strikes in sympathy with another labor union. The same condition exists all over the State. Indianola is not a peculiar, isolated section of the State which has a race distinction which does not exist anywhere else. It exists all over the State.

Now, let us test the matter of the fairness of the Senator. I have said the President was misinformed, and I repeat he was misinformed. It seems that the President has only talked with those of one side, and shuts his ears to anything on the other side. The President decided this matter without allowing the people of Indianola any hearing. He never asked for anything from them. There was not a single, solitary citizen of Indianola consulted about this matter. He said to the people, "You must have your office closed because you are forcing this woman to resign." There was not any opportunity to the people there to defend themselves against any charge made. On the contrary, on an ex parte hearing the President took his action. I believe the Senator from Wisconsin stated that he has not read all the correspondence between the President and his advisers. We are not yet advised of what we are called upon to answer; but from a one-sided statement by somebody, or bodies, the President suspended that office.

There is evidence which has been in the possession of the President of the United States, and which had not been presented to this body, which was read for the first time by the Senator from Wisconsin. So that, whatever that evidence may be, we know nothing about it, the people of Indianola know nothing about it, and we have no opportunity to defend ourselves against it or to deny it.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. I ask the Senator from Mississippi if I correctly understood him to say that he was denied the right to read the documents presented here by the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. When I received a letter from Mr. Chapman, which I read to the Senate on the 15th of this month in my former statement, I went to the Postmaster-General, read to him that letter, and asked him for a copy of the correspondence. I was told that that was never allowed, but that sometimes correspondence of that kind was read to those who desired to hear it, and that, under those circumstances, I must go to the President for permission to see it.

I went to the President, and I presented the request to him for a copy of the correspondence in obedience to the desire expressed by Mr. Chapman in his letter to me. I read the entire letter to the President and to the Postmaster-General. I was informed by the President and informed by the Postmaster-General that part of the correspondence was addressed to the President and not to the Postmaster-General. That correspondence I was not shown. I requested a copy of that correspondence. It was not shown to me, but the President wrote a card to the Postmaster-General, authorizing him, if he saw proper—I am not sure now whether it was to allow me to read the correspondence or to show it to me.

I carried that card to the Postmaster-General, and he read to me part of the report of the post-office inspector. I thought at the time, when I made the statement a while ago, that it was his first report, but my recollection now, after hearing the Senator from Wisconsin read it, is that it was the second report. I think it was the same report which was read here by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The Postmaster-General read to me also a letter of Mr. Humphreys, the member-elect to the House of Representatives from that district. My recollection now is that nothing else was shown me. My request was to see all the correspondence addressed to the President and to the Postmaster-General, so that I might know upon what was predicated the abolition of this office. The office may not have been abolished, as the Senator says, but it may as well be abolished for all the good it is doing the people of Indianola. They are getting no benefit whatever from it.

I did not get to see the letter from Mr. Davis. I was told that Mr. Davis had stated in writing that he would not guarantee the personal safety of the postmaster if she should return to take charge of the office. I challenge the reading of that letter, which is claimed to bear that construction. This is the first time I have ever heard it read. It was read as part of the testimony by the Senator from Wisconsin, but I challenge the reading of that letter to show that there is anything in it showing that Mr. Davis denied that the postmaster would be perfectly safe in returning to Indianola and taking possession of the office.

I have a letter from the mayor of the town which I will read, but before I do that I want to ask in reference to this matter, How could it be that those people could refute what was said in those letters when their contents were not known to them; when they were not only not aware of them, but when they were denied the opportunity to see them or to have them read, except as extracts were read from them? There was no opportunity on the face of the earth to contradict the evidence upon which the charge was made against them that there was a brutal and lawless element there, who have by threats, terror, and violence forced the resignation of the postmaster. This charge is against the entire people there, because the alleged threat, as contended by the Senator, consisted of a peaceable meeting petitioning the postmaster to resign. Every threat that can be found is found in that action of that meeting, because that is all that was done. The people of Indianola have had no opportunity to answer; they have had no opportunity to see the charge. They do not know what has been said.

The action of the Vehmgerichte was not worse than is this action against the people of Indianola, except in the severity of the penalty. I have read that more than six hundred years ago there existed a society, called the "Vehmgerichte," that tried its accused not only in his absence, but in his ignorance of the fact that he was accused. They tried him without letting him know there was any charge preferred against him. They convicted him; then they carried him into a room, where he was called upon to kneel before a crucifix, and then by a trap-door process they dropped him 80 or 100 feet below on revolving spears and knives, where he was cut to pieces, and after that he was only known as "the forgotten."

Now, what worse was that than this charge against these people, except that in this case the Government did not take their lives when they found them guilty? They took away from them the prop which upholds their business, the prop which upholds their correspondence, the prop which gives them the opportunity to read the news of the world in the daily papers. They took away from them the daily press, and did it upon a charge of which Indianola had no knowledge and which they were not even permitted to see.

When these people were denied post-office facilities, when the office was closed, this woman stayed there four or five days, walked the streets in perfect security and safety, and then went to visit relatives in Birmingham, Ala. Later she refused to go back and take charge of the office. No threat against her was made and can be found anywhere, unless it be in the fertile brain and imagination of the President, the Postmaster-General, and Senators, who find a threat in a peaceable assembly of a law-abiding community. I believe the Senator from Wisconsin did state that a majority of them were law-abiding people. In the assembly of this law-abiding people is found the threat of violence and of terror to this woman, so that she refused to go back and take charge of the post-office. The Administration refused to accept her resignation, and I suppose her pay goes on, though she refuses to perform the service.

Because the timorousness of this woman has prevailed upon her to refuse to go back and take charge of the office the people of Indianola are denied a postmaster—this timorousness, coupled with the refusal of the President to accept her resignation when it had been formally tendered.

Then what? The Post-Office Department ordered the mail to be forwarded where? To the nearest post-office? No; but they ordered it to be forwarded some 30 miles away—to Greenville.

Now, I want to read here what Mr. Justice Fuller, who now honors the office of Chief Justice of the United States, said in the case of in re Rapier:

> This is true, but while the legitimate end of the exercise of the power in question is to furnish mail facilities for the people of the United States, it is also true that mail facilities are not required to be furnished for every purpose.

The part to which I wish to call attention in that extract is this:

> The legitimate end of the exercise of the power in question is to furnish mail facilities for the people of the United States.

I have read the whole of it so that I can not be charged with having garbled it; I have read it from period to period.

> The legitimate—

I call especial attention to this part of that sentence—

> The legitimate end of the exercise of the power in question is to furnish mail facilities for the people of the United States.

I take it that means all the people of the United States and all of the United States.

Now, what? Suppose there had been some lawless persons in the town of Indianola who had made threats against the postmaster—I will say a lawless person, for that matter—and that the postmaster was driven out of office because of those threats; and suppose, as I said, the Senator from Wisconsin admits that most of the people are opposed to any such conduct, opposed to any such violence, opposed to any such threats, then what? Is it not right, is it not a duty of the sworn Executive of the United States and the Postmaster-General to furnish to those people the best postal facilities that can be furnished? Grant that it is the duty of the President of the United States to see that any officer of the United States is not intimidated; grant, for the sake of argument, that there was intimidation by some lawless man or men in small numbers in the town of Indianola, as is stated by the Senator from Wisconsin, and grant that his sense of duty impelled him, in order to see that such officers in the discharge of the functions of the Federal Government should not be driven out of that office, to close the office until the people there should be punished sufficiently to make them drive out those lawless men, whoever they were, what was his next duty?

His next sworn duty under the Constitution and laws of the United States was to give the people the next best facilities that they could have for their mail. Who denies or who will deny that? Will the Senator from Wisconsin deny it? Will any man in his senses deny it, whether he be a Senator, a Representative, or a private citizen of the United States?

It was the duty of the Government, through the courts, to enforce the law by the prosecution and conviction of anyone who unlawfully kept the postmaster from discharging her official duties, and to give mail facilities to all the people, but not to punish the innocent. The speech of the Senator, if his conclusions were admitted, shows that the innocent are being punished for what he says is the unlawful actions of a very few. The President is now punishing Indianola for making known in a peaceable, respectful, lawful way their desire for the change of an official. It is not a question, as claimed by the Senator, whether the President should sustain Federal officials in the discharge of their official duties; it is a question whether the people of any section of the country have the right to peaceably assemble and make known their wishes in respect to public affairs. That was all that was done in this instance. Nothing else can be found in the action of the people of Indianola by anyone unless it is a suspecting mind that attributes sinister motives to the most innocent act.

What did the President do? As I stated, he directed the mail to be sent to Greenville, 30 miles away. Four miles from there is Heathman. There is a railroad line, and only one railroad line, between Indianola and Greenville. It goes right by this office of Heathman, which, as I say, is only 4 miles from Indianola. A request was presented to the Postmaster-General to change this mail from Greenville to Heathman. While the laborer, the blacksmith, the shoemaker, the carpenter, the clerk, the lawyer, the doctor, the banker, the merchant, or anybody else engaged in business there, but especially the humbler citizens of the community, might not have an opportunity to go to Greenville oftener than once a week or even once a month, they could go over the 4 miles to Heathman and get their mail there.

But the answer to that letter was that the office at Heathman was not prepared with facilities for handling such a large mail as the mail of Indianola. Here is the letter of the Postmaster-General:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., January 15, 1903,

Hon. A. J. McLAURIN, United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Replying to your request that the mail for Indianola, Miss., be forwarded to Heathman, Miss., instead of to Greenville, as is now being done, I beg to say that Heathman is a very small office, of the fourth class, the entire receipts of the office amounting to only $115 last year. The office at Heathman is not in any manner equipped to handle such a large amount of mail as would be sent to it in the event your request was complied with.

Very truly, yours, H. C. PAYNE, Postmaster-General.

To that I answered—for I have the friendliest feeling toward the Postmaster-General, as I also have for the President of the United States, and they have both throughout this matter treated me with great courtesy, which I am now glad to acknowledge to the Senate and to the country—that I thought in considering this matter the Postmaster-General must have overlooked the letter which I read to him from the superintendent of education, Mr. Quinn. So I addressed this letter to the Postmaster-General:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., January 16, 1903.

Hon. H. C. PAYNE, Washington, D. C.

DEAR GENERAL: Your letter of yesterday is received this morning, in reference to my request that the mail for Indianola, Miss., be forwarded to Heathman, Miss., instead of to Greenville, Miss., until such time as the Indianola post-office shall be reopened, if such time shall ever come. I thought this request so reasonable that there could be no hesitancy in granting it, as without any extra expense to the Government the mail that is now placed by the Government about 30 miles from the patrons could be thus put within 4 miles of them.

In your denial of the request you say, "The office at Heathman is not in any manner equipped to handle such a large amount of mail," etc. You will remember that I called your attention especially to this part of the letter written by Hon. D. M. Quinn, county superintendent of education, January 10, 1903, to wit: "Crawford, the postmaster at Heathman, has two clerks in his store there, and assured me on Thursday of this week that he could handle the mail for Indianola without inconvenience." I also called the attention of the President especially to the same thing. This must have been overlooked in determining that the mail can not be handled at Heathman.

The people of Indianola have employed a person, as I understand, to carry their mail to Heathman and post it there, and have directed their correspondents to address them at Heathman, so the post-office at Heathman will have this mail to handle. The only mail for Indianola that will not be handled at Heathman will be that small amount that may be addressed to Indianola by some persons who have not been acquainted with the situation, in which small amount may happen to be some very important correspondence of some humble person not in the least responsible for existing conditions, from miscarriage of which such person may greatly suffer. While I have not express authority to do so, I take the liberty in behalf of the people of Indianola to propose that whatever extra expense the Government incurs in changing the mail for Indianola from Greenville to Heathman will be paid by the people of Indianola. If this proposition meets your approval, I will submit it for ratification to the Indianola people.

Faithfully, etc., A. J. McLAURIN.

I received the following reply, which reiterates the statement made in the first instance, that they did not have the mail facilities:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., January 21, 1903.

Hon. A. J. McLAURIN,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Replying to your letter of the 16th instant, I beg to say that I have carefully investigated the propriety of forwarding mail addressed to Indianola, Miss., to the post-office at Heathman instead of to Greenville, as is now the case.

As I have previously stated to you, Heathman is a small fourth-class office, the entire receipts for the year being about $100, and it is not in any manner equipped for handling mail to the amount which would be received in the event your request were complied with, and from the views of the practical post-office men in the Department it would not be desirable to carry out the plan you suggest.

Very truly yours,

H. C. PAYNE, Postmaster-General.

There can be no justification by anybody for the denial to the people of Indianola of the right to have their mail go to Heathman. The entire mail of Indianola practically does go to Heathman now. The Post-Office Department is compelled to provide facilities for the handling of the Indianola mail. It practically all goes there through private arrangements made by Indianola's people. There may be some straggling letters, as I wrote to the Postmaster-General, and there probably will be, written by some correspondent who has not been advised of the conditions there, and who does not know that a letter addressed to Indianola will not go to Indianola, but will be sent to Greenville, and, being sent to Greenville, the addressee will not receive it. It may entail some great hardship upon him; it may entail great loss, and it seems to me to be simply to carry out a determination to see that these people shall be punished into giving the assurance that this woman will be acceptable to the people of Indianola, an assurance that never will be given.

They say, "You must give us assurance." What assurance can they give? There has never been any violation of law by those people; there has never been any threat, and I challenge the prosecutor of these charges to show any threat that has been made against her, unless the peaceable assemblage of the people there can be denominated a threat—a peaceable assemblage of the people there to present their grievances and asking her, who had power to do it, to redress them by her resignation. If she did not want to do so, she was not required to do so any more than the President is required to grant a petition addressed to him. But surely that does not deny them the right to present the petition. That right existed in all times in this country. It exists in every free country. That the right of peaceably assembling and presenting petitions should not be abridged in certain particulars is put in the Constitution of the United States, but it is not given by the Constitution of the United States; the right to petition is not given by the Constitution of the United States. Those were rights the people had before. Those were inherent rights in the people to peaceably assemble and to present petitions for redress of grievances to any authority of the Government; but that it should not be infringed or abridged by the laws of Congress is given by the assurance of the Constitution of the United States.

I have here a letter from the mayor of Indianola. The Senator from Wisconsin construes a letter written by the mayor as implying that there would be great danger of physical violence to this woman if she came back, a construction that is unwarranted by the language. It would be unpleasant to the mayor, of course, and it would be unpleasant to all the people of Indianola, for her to come back there and reoccupy the office of postmaster, and for that reason she does not do it; not because she is afraid of violence, but she does not want to run counter to public opinion there; and public opinion is the opinion of the white people there, as is known to everybody there, whether white or black, and the negroes themselves recognize that. I am going to read this letter to show that there is no justification for the construction of the Senator from Wisconsin that any threat was implied in the letter of J. L. Davis. Not only that, but there is no justification for the construction which the Postmaster-General and the President put upon that letter.

Here is the letter:

INDIANOLA, MISS., January 17, 1903.

Hon. A. J. McLAURIN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I wish to thank you both personally and for the people of Indianola and vicinity for the great interest you have taken in our behalf and for the defense you have made for us. You know your people here, and you know that they are not the kind to forget a favor.

Now, as to Minnie Cox returning here, I want to assure you that she will be perfectly safe in returning, as safe as you yourself would be in coming here. But I want to impress on you the fact that there is not a man, woman, or child in this place who wants Minnie Cox as postmistress again. She has told at least a dozen people of this place that under no circumstances would she act as postmistress again, and as for defending her as postmistress, what would be the use in making such a statement, when she will not act in that capacity any more?

It has been claimed that this man would not give any assurance that he would defend her as postmaster if she came back, he being the mayor, and the sheriff would not give any assurance that he would defend her. He shows the reason for that was because there could be no necessity for giving an assurance of that kind, as she had uttered time and again her determination not to undertake to assume the office of postmaster there again.

She resigned the office voluntarily, and left the town of her own accord to visit a friend in Birmingham, and she knows that she can return whenever it suits her, or when she desires to do so. But we do not want her as postmistress, and if we can not get the office reopened, and continued without accepting her, we prefer to let it stand as it is. We did not force her to resign.

I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will remember that when he comes to comment upon the testimony of J. L. Davis, which he has introduced—

Right here, while it flits across my memory, I want to call attention to a statement of the Senator from Wisconsion in reference to the letter of the member-elect to the House of Representatives from that district, which I was not allowed during the time of his speech to correct. The Senator asserted that he would not have referred to the letter of the member-elect had it not been brought out by me. The Senator will recollect—and his remarks in the RECORD will show it when he comes to read them—that he was calling attention to the fact that certain parts of the correspondence in the Postmaster-General's Office had been read to me, or that the correspondence had been read to me. I then told the Senator what parts of the correspondence and the documents in the Postmaster-General's Office had been read to me; so that it was the Senator who brought it out. I was compelled, when he called attention to what had been read to me, to state what it was that had been read, and so it was brought out by the Senator, and not by me. The letter continues:

And when she ascertained that she was not wanted by the citizens of the town, she acted in good sense in resigning, and we commend her action.

Will the Senator say because she acted in good sense in resigning, that thereby he means that if she had not resigned the people would have gone with a mob and with guns and pistols and killed the postmaster or run her out? It does not mean anything of that kind; and yet it would be just as reasonable, just as natural, and just as logical an inference as the inferences which the Senator drew from the letter of J. L. Davis, read by him. He goes on afterwards and explains himself.

If the President and the Postmaster-General want to discontinue this office, and thereby ruin the commerce of one of the best and most law-abiding towns in the United States, they will have to do so.

Those people have not arraigned the President; they have had no grievance against the President or the Postmaster-General. They have all the time disclaimed any such intention. It is in the letters received by me, which I read to the Senate heretofore in the speech I made in the presentation of this case. They acquit the President and Postmaster-General of any malignity or of any disposition to oppress them in this matter, of any enmity or hostility to them. But they have felt, they feel now, and I feel, too, that the President of the United States and the Postmaster-General have been misinformed about this matter.

We still believe the President has been misinformed, as his character is one of rugged honesty, and we want you to see him personally and lay this matter before him. If when he understands the situation he still wants to keep our post-office closed, he will have to do so. I do not mean to convey the idea that Minnie Cox would be assassinated, or even insulted, were she to return and open the office, but let me make it plain to you when I say that the people of this place and vicinity do not want Minnie Cox, or any other negro, as postmaster. Your friends here feel grateful, indeed, for the stand you have taken and for the defense you are making for them. This place is void of a lawless element, and as mayor I know this to be a fact.

With kindest regards, I am,

Yours, very truly, J. L. DAVIS, Mayor.

Now, these people have only wanted to make it plain, as they have made it plain, or have tried to make it plain to Wayne Cox, that they do not want any negro postmaster in Indianola; that they would rather have no postmaster there at all. They want to make this fact plain, so that there can be no doubt about it and no quibble over it. While that is true, while that is the unanimous sentiment and feeling of the people of Indianola, at the same time they assert that she would be as safe to go back there and assume charge of the office as I, one of their representatives in the American Senate, would be to go to the town of Indianola. They make that plain. That contradicts the construction put upon the letter written by Mr. Davis to the inspector. He wanted to convey the impression there, probably in language not so explicit as the impression is conveyed in the letter to me and conveyed to the Senate by my reading it to the Senate, that it would be an unpleasant affair to the people; that they did not want a negro postmaster, they wanted a white postmaster, and they preferred to have no post-office at all rather than have a negro postmaster.

Now, they have made arrangements for a private post-office of their own. They have a post-office, not a Government post-office, but a private post-office of their own. They have engaged as postmaster a white woman. They have engaged a mail carrier, and that mail carrier every day twice carries their mail to Heathman, 4 miles away, and posts it there. At the same time they receive from Heathman the correspondence that is directed there for the people of Indianola. I have been told that the papers had it that if on the margin of the envelope there was the statement that the mail was for Indianola, notwithstanding the fact that it was addressed to Heathman, it was sent to Greenville. I can not believe that unless I have further evidence for it. Notwithstanding the fact that they are denied the benefit of their mail within 4 miles, and it is sent 30 miles, I do not believe if it were addressed to Heathman, and on the margin it was stated that it was for Indianola people, it would for that reason be sent to Greenville.

I have another little document here which I want to read. I desire to read from Mr. Baird, because I have nothing to conceal from anybody in this matter. Mr. Baird was at one time a representative in the State legislature, and is a lawyer there of high standing. He comes from a fine family. He writes as follows:

INDIANOLA, MISS., January 13, 1903.

Hon. A. J. MCLAURIN, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR AND FRIEND: Chapman tells me your original telegram was addressed to me as well as himself. I was not at home is the reason I did not reply. I have had very little to say or do with the matter; was not at the first meeting of citizens to discuss the negro question when the resignation of the postmistress was demanded. At the second meeting I acted and voted with the majority in protesting that it should go out to the world that the good people of the town were in favor of forcing any law-abiding citizens to give up an office or make them leave the town.

That is, a majority of the people.

Minnie Cox tendered her resignation to last meeting, to take effect 1st of January, 1903. Hoping you may soon be able to relieve us of the situation,

I am, sincerely,

THOS. R. BAIRD.

Mr. Baird is one of those who states that it was a voluntary resignation. Mr. Baird is one of those who voted against a resolution to make the doctor leave town, and voted with the majority in doing so—and I am informed the doctor did not leave town. That a resolution of that kind was introduced into the meeting certainly is not a reflection upon the whole people in the county and the whole State of Mississippi, because whatever reflects upon the people of Indianola is a reflection upon the people of the entire State of Mississippi, inasmuch as it is a representative community of Mississippi. I say, because such a resolution was introduced by somebody is no reason why the people of the whole State should be denounced and branded as lawless and brutal, and that is the effect of it.

A majority voted it down. They were there acting as a unit—that is, getting the will of the majority. Whatever was the will of the majority was the will of the entire meeting. So when the majority voted and the majority expressed their wishes, it became the wishes of the entire community, and the wishes of the entire community were that the negro doctor should not be required to leave town.

Of course, the matter discussed about the negro who insulted the young lady in the store was not a matter of any resolution. It may have been referred to. The thing that brought about the trouble at the time it was brought about was that on the 18th of September a young lady—respectable, chaste, well-conducted, well-behaved, deportment unexceptional, nobody complaining of her at all, working for a living as a clerk in a store—was approached by a drunken negro porter with improper advances, which she resented and which she reported to her friends, who immediately, to use common parlance, went after him, and he was compelled to flee the town.

Let me tell you I have no apologies to make for it for the people of Mississippi. It will be done at any time, under any circumstances, by the people of Mississippi, and it will take a hundred thousand bayonets to restrain them when the virtue of their women is assailed.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Mississippi permit me?

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPOONER. Mrs. Cox had not made any improper advances to any woman in Indianola, had she?

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi. I have not said that she has. I made no reflection upon the postmaster. She is of a very good negro character, as I suppose. She has the respect of the white people of that community as a good, well-behaved negro, as I understand. Still, the fact that the postmaster has made no improper approaches to anybody does not justify a negro porter in making improper advances to a woman because she happened to be a clerk and unprotected.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator mean to imply that I have justified that in anything I have said?

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi. The Senator can say himself whether his question to me meant that.

Mr. SPOONER. No; I say Mrs. Cox——

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi. I leave the Senator to say whether he meant that by his question to me.

Mr. SPOONER. I say whatever the people felt like doing or did do to this colored man who insulted a white woman would not afford any justification for the action against Mrs. Cox, because she had insulted no white woman.

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi. The Senator can not parry it in any way like that. I want to say that in the State of Mississippi, and in every other State where the people have the idea about it that we have, when the negro question is sprung and there is trouble between the negroes and the whites, especially growing out of a proposition like that, it inflames feelings and passions which ought to be permitted to lie dormant. I am saying this to show that when the people of a community, who are human, who are possessed of human impulses, human instincts, if there may be such a word employed, human intuitions, are aroused they act like people do everywhere else. They go to extremes when race feeling is aroused. I suppose it is so in the State of Wisconsin as it is in our State.

I remember that only a little while ago—I may have occasion to read an account of it—in the State of Kansas a negro killed a white man. They could not tell which of two had done it. A mob took one out and hung him, even in the State of Kansas, and it turned out, as the report of the newspaper stated afterwards, that it was a case of mistaken identity, and they had hanged the brother of the guilty man instead of the guilty man himself. I was calling attention to the insult offered by a drunken negro to a white girl in Indianola to show how race feeling broke out; how it lay quiet there for a long time; how the people had quietly submitted to this postmaster without raising any audible objection, and how they came to raise the objection just at this time, because there has been a great deal said—I inferred as much from the Senator's speech—as to why the people of Indianola permitted this negro woman to hold the office under the Administration of Mr. Harrison and under the Administration of Mr. McKinley and up to this time in the Administration of Mr. Roosevelt and just now come to raise the question.

I suppose there is always some reason for the action of human beings. I understood the Senator himself to read a letter of some man who had recently, from being a commercial, gold-standard Democrat, turned Republican to get the office, as Republicans in the South generally do, and that, wanting to get the office, he had instigated this movement to oust Minnie Cox. I infer that was the meaning of the reading of that letter, because it did not give any facts; it did not refer to any threats made or violence offered to this woman. He read the letter——

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator will permit me?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I read the letter to show that the purpose had existed there to force the resignation of Mrs. Cox. That is what he said in the letter.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. And to get a white Republican in—this new convert to the Republican party.

Mr. SPOONER. He stated a pertinent fact, if it is true, and there is nothing in the papers or in anything the Senator has said to dispute it. They had resolved—and resolved quite early—that Mrs. Cox must resign, and the Senator himself has shown that they signed a polite request to Mrs. Cox to resign her office by November 2. It is not very often, I suppose, that the white people of communities down South present petitions to colored people. But they fixed a date in the first instance for her to resign. What does the Senator think? Suppose in the exercise of this alleged right of petition they meet and pass a resolution requesting a man against whom they were enraged for some reason to have the kindness to leave town within twenty-four hours. I suppose that would be the exercise of the right of petition.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. That would depend upon circumstances. I have known men who ought to be requested to leave in considerably less than twenty-four hours, and I know men that have been so ordered to leave.

Mr. SPOONER. I have no doubt the Senator has.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Yes, sir; the Senator has.

Mr. SPOONER. But that is not the exercise of the right of petition. It is simply a threat, and everybody understands it is a threat; and when the people of a community circulate petitions to a Federal official, of whose conduct in the duties of the office there is no complaint, that she resign by a certain day—it is a wonder they did not fix the hour—does not the Senator regard that, situated as this woman was, as a threat?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. I do not. I do not regard it as any threat, because I do not believe these people would have done the woman the least harm if she had stayed there until now. I believe they would have taken a measure like they have adopted, to get their mail elsewhere. I believe she appreciated that. I believe she appreciated that their race distinctions went to the extent that they were not going to get their mail there any longer if she was postmaster; that they would have a white postmaster like they have, a private postmaster, getting their mail by private carrier from Heathman, as they certainly have a right to do.

Mr. SPOONER. I thank the Senator for his confession.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. I have made no confession. I am guilty of no crime.

I want to say one thing with reference to the Senator's statement that it is an unusual thing for the people to present a petition to a negro. That may be. But when they are put upon us and we make complaint, we ought not to be censured for it, unless it is on the idea of the boy who cried, "Ma! Ma! Make Bill behave himself. Every time I hit him on the head with the hammer he hallooes."

But the Senator a moment ago, when he interrupted me, said there was a resolution that the postmaster must resign. If the Senator persists in drawing illogical inferences and conclusions, he ought, in justice to the people of Mississippi, be accurate in his premises of facts. There was no resolution that she must resign. The resolution was that a committee be appointed to solicit signatures to a petition requesting her to resign. Having put their resolution in writing at a public, peaceable meeting to consult about their public affairs, the people of Indianola have a right to insist that the written resolution is the expression of their purpose.

Mr. SPOONER. If they had any complaint to make of the postmaster, why did they not make it to the man who appointed her and who could remove her? Why not make it to the man who had some power and responsibility? Why make it to the woman?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Simply because it has not yet got to that point in this country, thank the Lord, that a man can not petition a negro postmaster if he desires to do so, even if it is a negro woman. Even the people of Mississippi have that right accorded to them thus far.

Let me see what Wayne Cox says about this. He has spoken about it. I quote from the Memphis Morning News:

WHAT WAYNE COX SAYS.

Probably the most significant feature in substantiation of this statement is the interview of Wayne Cox, the husband of the recent postmistress. Cox is an intelligent, industrious negro. He owns probably $35,000 worth of property in and around Indianola, and the business interests of the community are his interests. He has enough sense to know that he and his wife can not afford to fly in the face of public sentiment. Before leaving for Birmingham yesterday he talked to a special representative of the Morning News for half an hour or more.

"If my wife or myself had known that she was distasteful to the white people of this community she would have resigned long ago. I am a citizen of this town. I have lived here for years. I pay taxes here on my property, and the interests of this place are my interests. The white people are my friends and have treated me with consideration and kindness. I would not openly or by indirection do anything to offend them.

"As soon as I learned that my wife was no longer wanted by the white people I advised her to resign. Her resignation was not due to threats or intimidation. None were made. My wife does not care for the place and would not have it under the circumstances.

"We expect to stay here, and we feel sure we will be accorded the fair and just treatment we have always had.

"I do not find fault with the white people—those who wanted my wife's resignation. I think, however, that a mass meeting was unnecessary. If representative citizens had simply come to us and stated the facts the resignation would have been forthcoming just the same."

There is the statement of Wayne Cox himself. He and his wife felt, just as the newspapers stated, that it was not the thing for them to do to fly in the face of public sentiment. They did not want to fly in the face of public sentiment. They are people of property living in that community. They are people who enjoy the confidence of the white people of that community and the esteem of the white people as negroes in their place. The mass of the negroes there are people without property. They have, in a financial way, no interest in common with Wayne Cox and his wife. But Wayne Cox's interests, his financial interests, are a community of interest with the white people who own most of the property in that community. He did not want to have their ill will. It is natural, and the people of this community could see that as well as anyone else could, that the Coxes did not want to incur the displeasure and ill will of the people of that community. Therefore it was only necessary to let them know that her resignation was desired and it would be forthcoming, as it was forthcoming.

Now, I omitted the other day to read a telegram which I had when I made the statement before, but which was not at my desk at the time. It was dated Indianola, January 9, 1903.

Senator A. J. McLAURIN, Washington, D. C.:

Postmistress voluntarily resigned her office. Voluntarily left town. Will be safe and protected when she returns. Will write.

P. C. CHAPMAN.

Mr. HOAR. Why did she leave town?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. She left town, as I am informed, to visit her people. She stayed in town four or five days and walked the streets there after the office was closed. She certainly did not leave—if that is implied by the Senator's question—from any fear or threats of violence.

Mr. HOAR. I did not mean to imply anything by my question. I do not want to meddle with this debate. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] will take care of his own side of it. It struck me as a very curious thing that somebody should telegraph to a Senator in Congress that a colored lady in some town in the interior of his State had left town; and I wanted to know how it happened that that particularly interesting piece of information was conveyed to the Senator. He says because she left town to visit some friends.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. It happened——

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator receive similar information about the movements of any other colored lady in Mississippi?

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. I do not know that any other colored woman has left town. I do not know that there has been any necessity for telegraphing about any other colored woman. I certainly am not in correspondence with them.

Mr. HOAR. How does the Senator account for the fact that a lady, having merely resigned an office and everything being agreeable all around, she being in no danger, somebody in one of the towns of his State should telegraph to him that she had left town? I suppose there is some reason for it.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. There is a reason which I would have given to the Senator if he had just asked the question and given me time to answer it before asking it the second time. There is an easy solution of it. I was home during the holidays, and when I reached Washington I found that this office had been discontinued. I believe the Senator from Wisconsin will not allow me to say abolished, but it had been discontinued in some way. I suppose the people of Indianola will be glad to hear it has not been abolished. When I reached here and found that the office had been discontinued and their mail ordered to Greenville, I addressed a telegram to Mr. Chapman asking him to send me the facts connected with it.

On the 8th I sent another telegram, asking him about the resignation of the woman, whether there was any threat made or implied against her by anybody; and the telegram I read is in response to the later telegram I sent to him. So there is nothing remarkable about his sending a telegram of that kind. I do not think there is anything remarkable about a Senator, who finds that one of the post-offices in the State which he has the honor to represent as one of the Senators in this Chamber has been discontinued, going to work to get the reopening of the post-office. So I am sure the Senator's alarm is not well founded.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I did not criticise or call attention to any telegram sent by the Senator. What I referred to was the one sent him.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. The one sent by the Senator provoked the one that was sent to him. It was in answer to the one I sent that Mr. Chapman sent this telegram to me.

I should like to say just here to the Senator and to the Senate that those people did not set about getting their office reopened. I did it because I thought it was my duty as a Senator to do all I could to cause the reopening of the office. I could only do it by sending to them for information. So far from their setting about it, they have been willing all the time, inasmuch as the President and the Postmaster-General saw fit to convict them of being a lawless and brutal element and to close up their post-office and to deny mail to men whom it is admitted never committed an unlawful act (I believe it is stated who had never gone so far as to commit the offense of asking or preparing to ask for the resignation of Minnie Cox), thus depriving those people of their mail—they are willing, inasmuch as they were thus convicted without a hearing of the charges against them, and without knowing that they were accused, and without being allowed the opportunity to confront their accusers, and conscious of the integrity of their peaceable action, to let the matter stand just as it is until the President and the Postmaster-General shall see fit to open it of their own accord, if it ever occurs to them to do so.

I have here an article from a paper which is not in our section, a paper published in New York. Possibly it has been seen by the Senator. Possibly it has been read by him. It is a paper of some influence in this country. It is regarded as a paper of some little standing in the United States, and probably across the water. I refer to the New York Herald. In its issue of January 12, 1903, it speaks of this matter; and this paper certainly has no feeling against the President of the United States, for until lately it had his name up as its candidate for the next President of the United States. The article is as follows:

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT SHOULD RETRACE HIS STEPS—THE COUNTRY DOES NOT WANT A DEPLORABLE COLOR ISSUE.

From the outburst of resentment throughout the South and the expression of sober Northern sentiment President Roosevelt must now realize that the ill-advised appointment of Dr. Crum, following closely on the abrupt closing of the Indianola post-office, was a blunder which has already done no little mischief, and which, if persisted in, can hardly fail to lead to the most deplorable consequences.

To this prevailing opinion of the country the President may well bow and promptly repair the mistake by accepting the resignation of Mrs. Cox, opening the Indianola office with a postmaster acceptable to its citizens, and withdrawing the obnoxious nomination from the Senate to avert a sectional discussion to be deprecated by the entire nation.

One of the results of the Spanish war hailed with keen satisfaction by the American people was the welding of Northern and Southern feeling in patriotic unity. It was a theme that President McKinley loved to dwell on, and is one on which President Roosevelt himself has repeatedly spoken with enthusiasm. But if the agitation now menaced should be fomented it would not only undo the good then done, but would set the country back a generation in color prejudice and sectional strife.

The sentiment against color in the South may be unfortunate and to be deplored, but the vital fact is that it exists, is universal and rooted in the growth of centuries. It may wear out, but can not be cut out. Mr. Roosevelt may buck against it, but neither he nor any other President, neither Congress nor the Republican party, can overcome it. He can no more enforce political equality of the races in the matter of office holding, which is not a Constitutional right of any citizen, black or white, than he can enforce social equality. Any strenuous attempt to do so will simply intensify prejudice against color, embitter race feeling, and cause sectional strife, in all of which the negro will inevitably be the greatest sufferer.

Apart from this view there is a controlling consideration of policy. It is a recognized international principle and established usage that a diplomatic representative must be, irrespective of merit or worth, persona grata to the government and people to which he is credited. For this reason President Roosevelt recalled the first counsel he sent to Habana. Now the same principle should apply to such prominent Federal officials as collectors and postmasters, who are brought into close touch with the people. Like a diplomatic representative, their usefulness depends in a large measure on their acceptability.

It matters not what the personal objection may be; if it is shared by the community and the appointment is obnoxious to the citizens that is enough to render it unfit and impolitic, especially in view of the fact that there are plenty of other men as well qualified and personally unobjectionable.

Would President Roosevelt think of forcing upon New York, Boston, Philadelphia, or San Francisco a collector or postmaster against the unanimous protest of business men and citizens? Why is not a leading Southern city entitled to equal consideration? He recalled Consul Bragg from Habana because he was not acceptable to the Cuban people. Why not recall the nomination of Dr. Crum from the Senate because it is obnoxious to the citizens of Charleston?

It is an issue of more than local concern and of far-reaching consequence. The Charleston appointment and the Indianola affair have stirred Southern feeling as it has not been stirred for years. Both were unwise and uncalled for steps in a policy which can only mean serious mischief and can not be abandoned too soon for the good of the negro as well as the white people of the South and the entire nation. It is to be hoped that the President will retrace his steps before a bitter sectional discussion is provoked in the Senate.

Now, then, that is not from a Southern paper. It is not from a Mississippi paper. It is from a Northern paper. It is from a paper published in the largest city in this Union, and probably the second largest city on the globe. Is is a paper that, as I said before, had at its masthead for the next President of the United States until a few days ago President Roosevelt. It recognizes the fact that this race distinction does exist. It probably deplores that the race distinction exists, but still recognizes it as a fact that can not be cut out, nor can it be worn out, but that it is there for all time; and he advises that the step by the President be retraced.

To be sure, President Roosevelt did not appoint Minnie Cox postmaster, but President Roosevelt received her resignation. President Roosevelt went about the inquiry whether the people had forced that resignation by duress or whether it was a voluntary resignation by Minnie Cox, and he gave the people of Indianola, who are are vitally interested in this matter as business men and citizens, no voice, no hearing in the determination of that question and in the result of that investigation.

Now, that is not all. Right here from New York I find this letter from Middleton, N. Y., January 10, 1903:

"STRENUOUS" ACTION'S HAVOC—POLICY OF THE PRESIDENT ON THE RACE PROBLEM IS DEPLORED.

To the Editor of the Herald:

Your most excellent editorial in the Herald of January 8 absolutely condemning the attitude taken by President Roosevelt on the negro question in the South is timely, logical, and wise, and will meet with the approbation of the American people.

Such "strenuous" action on the part of our President is sincerely to be deplored at this time and can but create havoc instead of cementing that friendship most needful toward upbuilding and perpetuating the strength of our country.

It should not be that we would antagonize the predominant and better element of the South, thus eliminating that influence especially necessary for the maintenance of this Republic. Such drastic measures will but inflame a prejudice that is by no means inert, and the result would be more than difficult to adjust.

Were it not even possible to obtain available material from the ranks of white citizens it would be a widespead calamity to force such obnoxious conditions upon those people most concerned. The negro occupies the place that God has willed, and it will ever be so in spite of any human force that could be applied.

Let us educate them along the lines that will make useful citizens in the sphere so ordained, and not permit false ideas to predominate over common sense and simple justice.

Other countries have solved to a great extent the race question, to a pleasing degree of satisfaction. Why not the greatest country on the face of the globe?

EUGENE WARE BRANNON.

MIDDLETOWN, N. Y., January 10, 1903.

There is the statement of the feeling of a man written to the New York Herald, a man who is not afraid and is not ashamed to put his own signature under it after he has done it.

Here is another one in the same issue of the New York Herald of January 13, 1903:

To the Editor of the Herald:

As a Southern Republican, wanting no office, desiring the negro to be given every opportunity to become a useful, capable, and respected citizen, and having the wish to spend my own life building up a home, helping to develop my country, and to serve my God, I could but say "Thank God!" upon reading your editorial on the Crum appointment.

The people of the South speak with respect and reverence of Lincoln, Grant, and McKinley, and were prepared to worship Mr. Roosevelt as their hero. In fact, Mr. McKinley so mellowed up the Southern people that they were ready to go into the Republican party by the thousands, and those who remained Democrats would have felt no resentment toward those who changed.

Mr. Roosevelt is bitterly hated to-day by almost all Southern white men, regardless of whether they be Republicans or Democrats. His position on the negro question has solidified the Democrats as no other conceivable policy could have done. He has aroused the bitterest of race feeling, and it is a question of time when murders will result therefrom.

He has given aid and comfort to that class of Southern Republicans who do not wish the party to build up down here lest it grow too big for each Republican to have a Federal office.

He has made it exceedingly embarrassing for that class of Republicans who love their party and feel that the continued prosperity of this country depends upon the continuance in power of the Republican party.

He has thrown away his every opportunity of doing good to the white people of the South and has placed the negro in the position where he will receive tens of thousands of kicks and cuffs that are wholly undeserved and for which Mr. Roosevelt is directly responsible.

Your paper is the greatest single factor in America, and we thank God that you have feared not, in kindness, to speak the truth.

SOUTHERN REPUBLICAN.

This man did not sign his name. This man does not state correctly the feeling of the people of the South against Mr. Roosevelt. There is no hate against Mr. Roosevelt, even because of the Indianola affair, because, as I have read from letters that are addressed to me in reference to this matter, some of them not intended to be read to the public and not even intended to be read to Mr. Roosevelt or the Postmaster-General, they have the friendliest feeling for him. They regard him as a man of honest, rugged integrity. They regard him as a man of impulse, however, and they regard him as a man who has gone off on this matter without giving both sides a hearing and without considering the judgment he first formed in regard to it.

I believe that these are about the only documents I desire to now read. I have some other newspaper clippings which I intended to read, but I have probably already taken up too much of the time of the Senate. I will read but one more:

WILSON AND INDIANOLA—DR. G. J. RED, OF LATTER PLACE, ON HOW THE TROUBLE STARTED AND HOW THE PEOPLE FEEL.

DURANT, MISS., January 20, 1903.

Dr. G. J. Red, a prominent citizen of Indianola, Miss., made the following statement to the correspondent for the News here to-day, having reference to the statement in Sunday's issue that Edgar S. Wilson knew of the impending post-office trouble at Indianola at the time President Roosevelt hunted in Mississippi:

"It is strange to me that Mr. Wilson knew all about the post-office affair at Indianola before I, a resident of said town, did. He is said to have known and spoken to the President while on his Mississippi hunt of said post-office about to give trouble, while we knew nothing about it. I would like for the world to know how this Indianola affair came up.

"A young lady clerking in a Jew store was insulted by a negro clerk. Half of the citizens of Indianola concluded at the time to stop the whole negro business. We simply asked them to resign. All agreed. There was no feeling between the negroes and the white people. It was simply a request. The white people were a little crossways among themselves.

"Now everything is quiet. We, the white people, are united. I learn from a Republican source that two-thirds of the negroes are pleased that Minnie Cox is out of the post-office. I can refer to said Republican if necessary. I do hope the President will look at this matter from the local viewpoint and eschew his personal feelings. We are perfectly satisfied with our present post-office arrangements, and if the President does not see fit to reestablish our post-office we, as good citizens, will have to submit and continue the present arrangements. What I say as truth will be vouched for by Hon. John S. Williams."

Mr. President, I have in this desultory way tried to present without acrimony the case of the people of Mississippi against the charge made by the Secretary of the President and stated to be made for him in the statement. It sums itself up in conclusion to my mind thus: That the people peaceably, lawfully, as they had a natural as well as a constitutional right to do, assembled to, in a peaceable way, rid themselves of a postmaster they did not want. Logically and legitimately it does not matter whether that postmaster was the proper person to be postmaster of the town of Indianola or not. It does not matter, so far as the proper discussion of this question is concerned, whether the people of Indianola, who are interested in the mail and the mail facilities, have any right at all to express any opinion or any choice of their postmaster.

They may not have any right of that kind. It may be that it is regarded that the people of Indianola are a people who are outlawed under the present Administration of the American Government from any participation in the Government, and that they should consider themselves fortunate if the Administration shall see proper to give them any postmaster. It may be that this is the position which is intended to be taken by the Administration in this matter and by the Senators who intend to prosecute this indictment against the people of the State of Mississippi, because, as I have said, it is an indictment against the whole State, for all the people of the State entertain the same views in respect to negro postmasters.

But it ought not to be denied anywhere, by the President of the United States, by the Postmaster-General, or by the Senate of the United States or any member upon this floor, that the people of Indianola, stripped as they may be of every other right, stripped of every part in the selection of the officers to serve them in that official capacity, still have a right to assemble peaceably, as they have done, and to petition for a redress of what they consider as their grievances, because in its last analysis the right to petition for a redress of grievances means a right to petition for the redress of grievances as they are conceived to exist by the petitioners.

It comes, then, to this, that this last right is still enjoyed by the people of the State of Mississippi, and they have only exercised that right at Indianola, and for its exercise they have been condemned without a hearing, denounced upon baseless assertions, and their postal facilities denied without redress. That race distinction exists no man denies. Whether it is right or wrong is not germane to this question. The sentiment concerning color may be wrong. I do not think it is wrong if it does not go to the extent of hate; if it does not go to the extent of enmity; if it only exists as the judgment of men that there is a race in this world which rises far above all other races; that there are races which are inferior to ours, as a necessary consequence, and that the races having the distinction of superiority and inferiority their association ought to be distinct.

If it goes no further than to the exercise of the right of judgment, and that judgment is that this superiority of the white race exists, then I do not think it wrong. But grant, for the sake of the argument, that it is wrong. The people of Indianola and the people of Mississippi have a right to exercise their judgment upon it; and if their judgment is based on this race feeling—that is, the feeling that goes to the extent of believing that the white race is superior to any other race on the face of the earth—they have a right to undertake, in a peaceable, law-abiding way, as they have done, to remove by petition to her any postmaster whose appointment conflicts with that sentiment and the judgment they have in reference to the races.

Now, granting, as I said, that this was wrong, they have a right to exercise that opinion and that judgment. They have exercised it, and that is all they have done. It may be hard upon the postmaster. She may wish that it were not so. I dare say she does wish that it was not so.

I will go further than that and say to the Senator that she, in my judgment, wishes that she were a white person instead of a negro. Still, the people of the State of Mississippi are not responsible for the fact that she is not a white person instead of a negro person. The people of Indianola are not responsible for the fact that she is a negro and that this distinction of races exists any more than she is responsible for being a negro.

And because these people have done that, it is claimed that it was duress, when there is not a scintilla of evidence produced here or anywhere else that they have offered the least single violence, unless the Senator, by his great power of eloquence and great power of debate, can construe this, as he has done, into an implied threat. He has so construed the exercise of an inalienable right, of a natural right, of a right guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States, never to be abridged, and unless the Senator can, by the force of his powerful genius and his powerful oratory, convert that into an act of duress there has been no duress whatever. His ingenious handling of the case to relieve the Executive of the embarrassment of his ill-advised act does credit to the Senator's ability, but it does not convince any thinking man that the people of the United States commit a crime by peaceably assembling and appointing a committee to prepare a petition addressed to a negro postmaster asking resignation.

There is a species of duress when the people of one community change their officials. When the people of the United States change from one party to another in this country, there is a duress which compels the appointees of one party to get out and give place to the party which comes into power. There is a duress which by ballot compels the President of the United States to give up his place to another President. Still there is nothing unlawful about it. It is the exercise of a constitutional right of the American people.

That the race distinction exists, as I have said, I am not responsible. The people of Mississippi are not responsible for it. The people of Mississippi are no more responsible for the condition of servitude imposed upon the negro in the South and in New England than we are for the barbarous and cannibalistic character of his ancestors.

This race, as I said, was elevated in this country, at least a portion of it, from a condition of barbarism and cannibalism to slavery, and they have been benefited and blessed by it, while the white people of the country have been cursed by it. But for slavery there would never have been a negro in the United States. None was brought, even by New Englanders, from motives of love or charity. Those who are here would have been in the jungles of Africa, feasting upon the flesh of their captives.

Now, I have no feeling of ill will or enmity against the colored race. My feeling toward the race is that of kindness. I know that there are many of them who are good people. I class great numbers of them among my friends. I would protect them wherever I had the opportunity to do so. I had the opportunity when I was a 19-year-old schoolboy to protect one of them from the violence of a mob, and I did it.

I afterwards had the opportunity, when I was a private citizen of my own State, to appeal to the reason and better judgment of an enraged mass of three or four thousand people who were about to take a negro who had shot down a little white girl 13 years old and stood over her with his pistol and shot bullet after bullet through her body into the ground so close that he set her clothes on fire. They had possession of him and were carrying him to a limb, and I made an appeal to them to let the law take its course and let him be punished according to law. The appeal was successful. They turned him over to the officers, and he was, by the sheriff of that county, under a warrant issued under the sentence of the court, executed in the presence of four or five thousand inhabitants of that section.

On another occasion, when I was the governor of Mississippi, and there had been a riot between some of the white people and some of the negroes about 50 miles from the capital of the State, precipitated by the shooting down from ambush and killing the officer and wounding his posse by a mob of thirty or forty negroes, when the officer was in search, with a warrant for the arrest of, a negro for a deadly and unprovoked assault, I, chartering a caboose, went to the nearest station, some 10 miles from the scene of the conflict, rode horseback in the night over muddy, corduroy roads, and reached there just in time to persuade a mob of 150 or 200 men who had caught five of the offenders to desist from the execution of them by lynch law and to commit them to the hands of the officers; and they did it.

I have been in favor of law and order. I have been in favor of the execution of the law. I would not do any harm to any negro because he was a negro. I would rather see him educated; I would rather see him improved. I am not one of those who believe you can ever educate him up to be a white man; that you can ever educate him to the standard the white man occupies in the scale of the races of the world. I am one of those men who do not believe that all the education you can apply to him can make a white man of him or give him the character and capacity of a man of the white race. I have friends of the negro race for whom I would travel through bitter cold or sweltering heat. They are men and women of good impulses, but I know and so do they that they can not be made of the white race.

Still, I believe that he can be improved. I believe that his condition and standing and importance to the community can be improved by education, and I have helped to do it. I have gone further than that. I have by money of my own purse educated a negro who had been my faithful servant, who had stood by me as my friend. I educated him not only in the private school in my neighborhood, but I sent him off to a high school of the negro race and gave him the benefit of education there.

I have many friends among this race. I have many friends by whom I would stand and who would stand by me. I know that there are a good many good negroes. I know there are many bad negroes. I know there are many mean negroes. I know that the vicious elements of the negro race have been encouraged by the cry against the people of the South to commit crimes that have caused the death of innocent women and innocent girls and have caused the lynching and torturing of the negro fiends themselves. They have taken it that the people who have inveighed against the people of the South were doing it because they approved of the crimes that were being committed by these negroes.

I have in my mind now a poor helpless, feeble, defenseless woman in Mississippi, who last summer was murdered and outraged when she was just about to become a mother, by a brute who had committed crimes against members of his own race and outrages upon the females of his own race, as he confessed in the presence of impending death. The man was betrayed by his own wife as the criminal who had committed the crime, because he had whipped his wife mercilessly and cruelly, and the people in their indignation rose and lynched the fiend. I know these things exist, and I know that a great many of them have been encouraged by unwarranted attacks upon the people of my section. But at the same time, as I have said, we have in our State many good negroes.

Mississippi, I will say in conclusion, sympathizes, the entire State sympathizes, with the people of Indianola. The State of Mississippi has undergone many changes and vicissitudes in its short but checkered life. I am not an old man myself, but I can remember the time when the pioneers of Mississippi laid the ax to the root of the tree and felled the forests and converted them into productive fields, the products of which fed her citizens and clothed a quarter of the civilized population of the globe. I can remember the time when our people had developed into a prosperous, proud, rich State, rich in its material wealth, rich in finances, rich in its manhood and in its womanhood, and assembled on our natal day, the glad shouts from the lusty lungs of her sons were heard, and her beautiful women nodded approving smiles when their orators beneath the folds of the Stars and Stripes told of the struggle of the Revolution and discoursed of the glories of independence and of liberty and the blessings of the American Union.

I have seen the times when the people of the State, in the harvest season, enjoyed themselves with the hunter's horn, following the chase to the music of the hounds. I have seen another time come when they were impelled, right or wrong (I am not here to argue, because the question has been submitted to the arbitrament of the sword), to sever their connection with the American Union. I have seen her sons, with singular unanimity, go out to fight for what we conceived a holy and a sacred cause, in the protection of their firesides and their homes and their women and their little ones against invasion.

I have seen the soil of Mississippi drenched with the blood of her sons that laid the dust like rain. I have seen the careworn women and hungry children of our State cry for bread while the contents of their cribs and their smokehouses went up in flames kindled by the hands of invaders in resistless numbers. I have seen the elements black with the smoke of our cities and towns and villages and country homes, and our schoolhouses and churches and eleemosynary institutions erected for the care of the halt and lame and blind and deaf and dumb and those bereft of mind, when the torch was applied by hostile armies. I have seen the time come when, arrived at the age of 16, under a sense of duty I still approve, I took a rifle as a private and joined the ranks to fight against that Government for the establishment of which my ancestors only three generations removed fought in the incipiency of the Revolution. I have seen the time come when, our treasury emptied, our ranks depleted, the sources from which they were recruited exhausted, we were compelled to lay down our arms, and $400,000,000 of property in which the Constitution of the United States invited us to invest the fruits of our toil was swept away without indemnity. I have seen the time come when it was declared that we were not a part of this Union. I have seen the time come when there was put in charge of the government of Mississippi a race of people who knew no letter nor no book, who knew nothing of government except the absolute government of the slave by the master, and whose only training for self-government, to say nothing of the training for the government of the white superior race, and whose only elevation from barbarism and cannibalism was found in the school of slavery.

I have seen the legislative halls of our State filled with members of that race, not one of whom could write his name or tell a letter in the alphabet or paid a dollar of taxes to support the Government. I have seen peaceable assemblies of her citizens ordered by Federal military to disperse when they were in social converse on the Sabbath evening, and because they refused to do so, old men, 80 years of age, marched off through the mud 4 miles to a jail, from which one man died. I have seen a man who was military governor of the State of Mississippi, who was not a citizen of the Sate, elected to this body.

I have seen another day come, after this mad carnival, when the State government of Mississippi was turned over to its own people. I have seen the State of Mississippi literally rise from its ashes, rebuild its waste places, build its factories, its mills, its ports, its cities, its towns, and its villages.

I have seen another war come, when the people of the State of Mississippi marched to the beat of the drum under the flag of the Stars and Stripes, united again with the Northern people to fight the battles of a common country. I have seen, as I thought, a happy reuniting of these sections. But allow me to say that in all this time I have never yet heard it said by any authority until now that we had not the right to peaceably assemble and peaceably present our request for what we desired in reference to our public affairs.

It may be that it will come to this; it may be that this is a step in the fastening of this chain upon us; but I assure you that, while we may be compelled to submit to it, willingly or unwillingly, under the Administration as it now stands, we never will do it without our protest. In the language of McGregor:

> O'er the peak of Ben Lomond the galley shall steer,
> Through the depths of Loch Katrine the steed shall career,
> And the rocks of Crag Royston like icicles melt
> E'er our wrongs be forgotten or our vengeance unfelt.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT NOME, ALASKA.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Out of order, I ask leave to report from the Committee on Territories the bill (S. 4424) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Nome, in the Territory of Alaska, and ask that it be referred, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks that the Committee on Territories be discharged from the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. QUAY. I do not understand that the committee is to be discharged. On this occasion I am opposed to discharging the Committee on Territories. My understanding is that the committee reports the bill favorably, and asks that it be committed to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. Am I in error about that?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No; the Senator is entirely correct; but I thought when it was suggested that the Committee on Territories be discharged and that the bill be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds that that, of course, was discharging the Committee on Territories; but the action of the Committee on Territories is a favorable report on the bill with a request for its reference, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. I thought that in itself operated as a discharge of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana, from the Committee on Territories, reports the bill, the title of which he has stated, and asks that it be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is correct, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, that order will be made.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] who has charge of the pension bills will yield to me, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. We shall only be in executive session for a very few minutes.

Mr. HOAR. I ask what was the unanimous-consent agreement for this hour, if any?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That at 5 o'clock unobjected pension cases on the Calendar should receive consideration.

Mr. GALLINGER. With the understanding that the executive session will take but a minute, I yield.

Mr. CULLOM. It will take but a minute, I think. I am not at liberty to explain in open session why it is that I desire an executive session.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, where there has been a unanimous-consent agreement that certain business shall occupy the Senate for an hour at a fixed time, it seems to me it is a violation of that unanimous-consent agreement to do any other business whatsoever.

Mr. CULLOM. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will allow me, I was about to say that the understanding being that there is nothing contemplated by the honorable Senator from Illinois, except a mere formality, no Senator would object, and I do not think that would be a practical violation of the agreement. I wish, therefore, to have it understood——

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us proceed with the regular order, and go into executive session when we get through with that.

Mr. HOAR. I think when a unanimous-consent agreement is made it is understood that it shall not exclude the transaction of mere formal business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first pension bill on the Calendar will be stated.

CENTRAL ARIZONA RAILWAY.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I wish to ask unanimous consent to call up Senate bill 6968.

Mr. KEAN. I do not think we can transact any legislative business except pension bills this evening. I do not know what bill the Senator wishes to call up.

Mr. BURTON. I do not think the Senator will make any objection.

Mr. KEAN. I do not object, only I do not think it comes under the unanimous-consent agreement. I do not think we can do it.

Mr. BURTON. I ask unanimous consent. I have here a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, stating that the bill is entirely satisfactory. I did not have the letter the other day, and I can not call up the bill on Monday. I do not think the Senator from New Jersey ought to ask to have the matter go over, especially since Congress has passed a similar bill. I have in my hand a letter from the Secretary of the Interior stating that the bill is entirely satisfactory to the Department.

Mr. KEAN. Personally I know nothing about the bill the Senator from Kansas desires to call up, but I think the understanding was that there should be nothing but pension legislation after 5 o'clock.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I did not take up the time of the Senate to-day when other Senators were calling up bills by unanimous consent, and unless the Senator is willing to allow the bill to come up by unanimous consent, I shall make a motion to consider it at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill was before the Senate the other day and read in full.

Mr. KEAN. I shall have to object, Mr. President.

Mr. BURTON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 6968.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator will not do that.

Mr. BURTON. The objection is captious. The Senator understands very well that on Monday I can not call up the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. There will be plenty of time afterwards.

Mr. BURTON. No; I insist upon it. I have not asked this privilege of the Senate heretofore. Objection was made the other day because I did not have a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, and I have it here now. The bill is entirely satisfactory to the Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the following bill.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 6968) granting the Central Arizona Railway Company a right of way for railroad purposes through the San Francisco Mountains Forest Reserve, in the Territory of Arizona.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I desire to ask what was the unanimous consent which was given to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was that unobjected pension bills should be taken up at 5 o'clock, and that consideration should be given to them for one hour.

Mr. GALLINGER. Unless sooner disposed of.

Mr. HOAR. I have not the least objection to the Senator's bill, but I have a very strong feeling about the observance of unanimous-consent agreements.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Was it the unanimous-consent agreement that there should be no other business taken up this afternoon?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was not.

Mr. MORGAN and others. No.

Mr. HOAR. I was so informed when I asked the question before.

Mr. CULLOM. When the Senator made the point of order at the beginning I thought there was force in it, and therefore I withdrew my motion, but it did not interfere with the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. HOAR. I did not make a point of order. I put the question simply.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There was no such unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. HOAR. Very well; then I have nothing to say about it one way or the other. I do not say anything about the Senator's bill. I merely wished to know what the unanimous-consent agreement was. If that be observed, it is all I insist upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unanimous-consent agreement has been observed. The order under it has been completed and the Senator from Kansas moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill which has been read by title. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. It has been read.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read again. I do not remember anything about it.

Mr. BURTON. Here is the letter from the Secretary of the Interior, if the Senator will allow it to be read. It is very short.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the letter be read.

Mr. BURTON. All right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the letter.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the Senator from Kansas will not insist upon the further consideration of this bill under the circumstances.

Mr. BURTON. Under the advice of older Senators here——

Mr. CULLOM. I am very anxious to accommodate the Senator, but I think under the circumstances he should not press the bill.

Mr. BURTON. And I know two of them, at least, are my friends, I wish to withdraw the bill for the present from consideration.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed with the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, January 26, 1903, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 24, 1903.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Rev. HAROLD M. RIDER, of Baltimore, Md., as follows:

Almighty God, we invoke Thy presence this day in Congress assembled. The final basis of all law and authority is in Thee. Thou art the Alpha, the beginning of all things; from Thee we came. Thou art the Omega, the ending of all things; to Thee we must go. Thou art the everliving God; in Thee we live and work and aspire. Give us such a sense of our responsibility to Thee that all legislation shall be wise, all administration just, all national and individual relations sympathetic.

In the performance of our duties may we receive guidance and inspiration from Thee.

Hear Thou and answer our prayer, in the name and for the sake of our highest ideal of manhood; for Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE FOR PROCEEDINGS OF SUNDAY, JANUARY 25.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, with the consent of the House, will designate as Speaker for the proceedings of to-morrow the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. GROSVENOR.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (S. 2296) to amend an act approved March 2, 1895, relating to public printing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota calls up a conference report, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the bill S. 2296, entitled "An act to amend an act approved March 2, 1895, relating to the public printing," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House and agree to the same.

JOEL P. HEATWOLE,
VINCENT BOREING,
F. C. TATE,
Managers on the part of the House.

T. C. PLATT,
S. B. ELKINS,
JAMES K. JONES,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The effect of the accompanying report is to allow to the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate 20 extra copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the use of the Senate.

JOEL P. HEATWOLE,
VINCENT BOREING,
F. C. TATE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. HEATWOLE] has not moved the previous question, and if he does not propose to do so, I would ask for recognition at this time.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. HEATWOLE. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for only five minutes.

Mr. HEATWOLE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, it is not directly on the proposition before the House that I desire to address myself. I have no objection to the adoption of this conference report or to the printing of these CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS; but some eight or nine months ago this House by an almost unanimous vote agreed to print 200,000 copies of what is known as the "Horse Book," for the use of members of the House. I do not think there is any book for which the members of this House have more demand, and the fact that they do have a demand for it demonstrates conclusively that it is useful, that it is read, and that it is not a waste of the public money to print it.

From time to time we authorize the printing of numbers of documents, just as we will this morning authorize the printing of these books, with practically little demand for them. There are numbers of resolutions brought in here from time to time by the committee, and I am not attempting to criticise the committee, because it may be necessary to print some editions of these books. But we order numbers of reports printed here that nobody ever reads, that have a final resting place in the subcellars of this Capitol, and are of benefit to no one; and with the resolution pending before the Senate committee for the printing of the Horse Book, I think it is the duty of Committee on Printing to stop the passing of these Senate resolutions for printing until some attention is paid to that resolution of ours.

Mr. HEATWOLE rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Will the gentleman from Alabama kindly name some of the useless books that have been ordered by the House by resolution and that have gone into the basement of the Capitol? And, furthermore, I should like to know if the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is not desired by every member of this House? The Committee on Printing has been importuned for the last three or four years to have the number of CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS increased.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I said in my opening remarks that I had no objection to this particular resolution; that I thought it more or less useful, but there are comparatively few men who call for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, while there are thousands who want to have printed the book issued by the Agricultural Department on the Diseases of the Horse.

In answer to the question as to what useless books have been ordered, I can not enumerate them now, but there is not a member on the floor of this House who does not know that he has a number of books on his list to-day that no one ever asks him for; and it was only last year that, in order to get rid of those volumes, the superintendent of the folding room had to send out and request members to let him dispose of the useless volumes to their credit down here in the basement of this Capitol.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Is it the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the gentleman refers to?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I am not opposing the printing of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Is that what is involved in this motion?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No, sir.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. We understood that you were opposing the printing of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which we would be sorry to see you do.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all. I am not opposing the printing of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but I say that this House over nine months ago, by a resolution, directed the printing of 200,000 copies of the Horse Book, and that it is allowed to be buried in a committee of the Senate; that we are passing Senate resolutions for the printing of useless books, and I say that we ought to stop printing those books and passing those resolutions entirely until the resolutions that we have sent to the Senate have been considered and acted on, for things that we want and need for our constituents.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. That is all right.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is all I have to say.

Mr. HEATWOLE. I want to say to the gentleman from Alabama that by resolution of this House no useless books have been printed, so far as the committee have been able to learn. Every resolution presented to the committee has been carefully considered. It is true there are many useless publications, but they come from the Executive Departments and not from Congress.

I now move the previous question on the adoption of the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The conference report was agreed to.

HENRY M. HOLMES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Senate amendment to the bill (H. R. 1193) to correct the military record of Henry M. Holmes.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

ADAM STUBER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 5118) granting an increase of pension to Adam Stuber, with a House amendment thereto, disagreed to by the Senate.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker named as conferees on the part of the House Mr. DARRAGH, Mr. GIBSON, and Mr. CROWLEY.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York, chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 16910, being the Agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Pending that motion I would like to make some arrangement as to general debate. I have had no request from any gentleman on this side for time and know of none from the other side.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. If we can go along without any arrangement at the present, I think we can save time by it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Very well.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. POWERS of Maine in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 16910, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16910) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, the House by reading the report on the bill will notice that the bill carries $5,238,860; the amount carried in the current fiscal year is $5,208,960, showing a net increase of $29,900. Though the amount appropriated is about $400,000 less than the estimates, the committee, in view of the very liberal amounts appropriated last year, and which are still in force, deem that the appropriations in this bill are ample to enable the Department to do progressive and good work. The main increases are $40,000 in the Bureau of Animal Industry, to enable the Department to purchase more ground for a quarantine station near Jersey City, and the purchase of new ground at Baltimore, on the water front, where stock coming from abroad can be landed immediately in the quarantine station, without danger of transporting them by railroad or highway; and to enable them to carry out the provisions of the oleomargarine bill, in regard to the examination and chemical analysis of process or renovated butter.

The increase of $10,000 allowed the Bureau of Chemistry is recommended by the committee to enable that Bureau to make further experiments in researches into the manufacture of table sirup in the South. The increase of $10,000 allowed the Bureau of Entomology is recommended to enable the Department to make further and more extended investigations into the cotton boll weevil and worm in Texas and other States, with a view to find some means to exterminate it; for if that is not done it will inflict incalculable injury on the cotton industry of the South. These are the main increases. We have allowed another small increase of $5,000 to be added to the appropriation for agricultural experiment stations, to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to report upon the organization and progress of farmers' institutes in the several States and Territories.

Only two salaries have been increased, one by $200 to the assistant chief of the Biochemic Division of the Bureau of Animal Industry and $500 to the chief of the Division of Publications. Both of these salaries the committee have taken into careful consideration, and deem it only fair and just to give them to two competent men who have served in their present positions for many years.

Mr. HULL. Why did not the committee report them in a separate bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa, he knows how difficult it is to pass a separate bill.

Mr. HULL. If this is absolutely right, that is the proper place for it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. We have created the office of assistant chief of the Weather Bureau, and chief clerk to the Bureau of Chemistry. These are the only changes in the salaries of the Department. With that brief statement, we will take up the bill under the five-minute rule, and as we shall reach the different paragraphs I will be glad to answer any questions that may be asked.

Mr. BURKETT. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. BURKETT. I notice in the report that the appropriation on irrigation is cut down from $65,000 to $25,000. What is it that is to be cut out of this work?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is simply a reduction in the amount of the appropriation. If you will read the report——

Mr. BURKETT. I have read the report.

Mr. WADSWORTH. You will see—that upon full and careful consideration your committee have reached the conclusion that the appropriation heretofore made for this specific purpose might be reduced without detriment to the public interests, and has therefore recommended the sum of $25,000 for the ensuing year. In recommending this reduction the committee does not wish to be understood as questioning the value of the work that has heretofore been done by the Department along these lines. On the contrary, the committee is of the opinion that this work has been so thoroughly and well done as to render unnecessary a continuation of the large appropriation heretofore made for its prosecution. The view of your committee is that the full duty of the Federal Government will be performed if it maintains a small staff of trained experts on irrigation, who shall keep abreast of all the developments relating to this subject, compile and publish from time to time such information as they may acquire and the interests of the people may demand, and offer suggestions and advice in response to individual requests.

The view of the committee is that the full duty of the Federal Government will be performed if it maintains a small staff of trained experts, and in view of the fact that the States have experiment stations and expert irrigation men, it is not necessary to keep up a large force.

Mr. BURKETT. I would ask the gentleman if any provision has been made to transfer any of this work?

Mr. WADSWORTH. None, whatever.

Mr. BURKETT. Has this matter been taken into consideration by the committee?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It has not.

Mr. BURKETT. Has the committee taken into consideration the work that the Agricultural Department has done, and that which is now to be clipped?

Mr. WADSWORTH. We believe, in view of the fact that they have already done a great deal of work, that it is not necessary to keep up the force as large as it now is.

Mr. BURKETT. Knowing that similar bureaus were doing work, I asked to be furnished with a statement of some of the work they were doing, and I have it. It is, first, investigation and study of irrigation of rice in the Southern States, which seems a commendable branch to some people.

Mr. WADSWORTH. When we reach that item of the bill my colleague [Mr. SCOTT] has all the data, and will make a very full explanation of the matter.

Mr. BURKETT. What I wanted to know in the general debate was what particular parts of irrigation should be clipped out, and what bureaus transferred to any other bureau. As I look it over there is some work which should be done by the Government, and it should continue the work.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman takes his seat, I would like to call his attention to the increases in the salary mentioned on page 2 of the report, where it says:

Two increases in salaries have been allowed, $200 to the assistant chief of the Biochemic Division of the Bureau of Animal Industry and $500 to the chief of the Division of Publications. Both of these cases were carefully looked into by the committee and were considered only fair and just on account of long and efficient service.

These items are not large, but it occurs to me that a principle is involved in that statement. These increases seem to be in the nature of longevity pay. Now, suppose a new chief or a new assistant chief of the Biochemic Division, or a new chief of the Bureau of Publication, should be appointed after the passage of this bill, this will constitute a precedent, will it not?

Mr. WADSWORTH. For those divisions; yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Does the gentleman believe the duties of the division, without regard to the special merits of the officers who fill them, are such as to justify these increases?

Mr. WADSWORTH. In this case I do, but in a great many cases I do not think so.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, I have not had time to read this bill in full, but as I represent an agricultural district I am interested in the question of the distribution of seeds and farmers' bulletins. I want to ask the gentleman from New York, the chairman of the committee, if there is any difference in this bill and the previous bill as to the amount appropriated for these two purposes, or whether they are increased or decreased?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; the amounts appropriated are the same, and they are distributed in the same way.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I notice in the appropriation bill the amount appropriated is $25,000 for irrigation, while last year it was $65,000. I think the estimates of the Secretary were $75,000. Will the gentleman state more fully than the report states why this decrease is made?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have just been over that somewhat with the gentleman from Nebraska. I think when we reach that item in the bill we will take it up and discuss the whole matter.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Very well.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time. Now, if no one else wishes to speak, I will ask for the reading of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I have promised time to gentlemen on this side, but I do not see them now in the Chamber. I suppose that we might consider general debate closed; but I will ask consent that if gentlemen enter later while the reading of the bill is going on under the five-minute rule, I may be permitted to give them the time they ask.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Mississippi if he can not arrange to give me about fifteen minutes when we reach the head of the soil service?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I will ask that as one of the conditions. It is understood, then, that during the course of the reading of the bill I shall have permission to yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], and time, not exceeding twenty minutes, to each of two other gentlemen if they come in.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Very well.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I would like to interrupt the gentleman from New York to inquire whether there is anything in the bill making appropriation for good roads?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No, sir.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Or for a civil pension list?

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is no civil pension list.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

General expenses, Bureau of Plant Industry; vegetable pathological and physiological investigations: Investigating the nature of diseases injurious to fruits, fruit trees, grain, cotton, vegetable, and other useful plants; experiments in the treatment of the same; the study of plant physiology in relation to crop production and the improvement of crops by breeding and selection; to investigate the diseases affecting citrus fruits, pineapples, and truck crops grown during the winter in the Southern States; to investigate canaigre and other tannin-bearing plants; to investigate and report upon the diseases affecting plants on the Pacific coast; to originate or introduce improved varieties of fruits and vegetables in cooperation with the section of seed and plant introduction; to study the relation of soil and climatic conditions to diseases of plants, particularly with reference to the California vine diseases and diseases of the sugar beet, in cooperation with the Bureau of Soils, and for other purposes connected with the discovery and practical application of improved methods of crop production; to continue the work of originating, by breeding and selection, in cooperation with the other divisions of the Department and the experiment stations, new varieties of oranges, lemons, and other tropical and subtropical fruits more resistant to cold and disease and of better quality; varieties of wheat and other cereals more resistant to rust and smut and better suited to the various sections of this country; varieties of cotton more resistant to disease and of longer and better staple, and varieties of pears and apples more resistant to blight and better adapted for export; to investigate the causes of decay in forest timber and timber used for construction purposes, and to devise means for preventing the decay of the same; to investigate the practical application in agriculture of the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen by bacteria and other microorganisms in soils and in the root tubercles of leguminous and other plants; to cultivate and distribute these nitrogen fixers and to determine the conditions most favorable to their development; to study and find methods for preventing the algal and other contaminations of water supplies; the employment of investigators, local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and student scientific aids at an annual salary of $480 each, and other labor required in conducting experiments in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and collating, digesting, reporting, and illustrating the results of such experiments; for telegraph and telephone service; for gas and electric current; purchase of chemicals and apparatus required in the field and laboratory; necessary traveling expenses; for express and freight charges; the preparation of reports and illustrations; the rent and repairs of a building, not to exceed $3,000 per annum; all necessary office fixtures and supplies, and for other expenses connected with the practical work of the investigations, $110,000.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of inquiring of the chairman of the committee how much new legislation there is in the bill to which attention is not called in the report?

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is practically no new legislation. There is no new power delegated to the Secretary or any of his subordinates.

Mr. MADDOX. There is no legislation in the bill that is not pointed out in the report?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No, sir.

Mr. MADDOX. The report states all the changes in legislation?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Tea-culture investigations: For all expenses necessary, including the employment of labor in the city of Washington or elsewhere, to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and report on the cost of making tea and the best method of cultivating and preparing the same for market, so as to demonstrate whether it is practicable to introduce its culture in the Southern States as a profitable industry, and for all necessary fixtures, supplies, apparatus, material, and other expenses, $10,000.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I notice that this item carries an appropriation of $7,000 for the purpose of determining the cost of "making tea." I think there are a great many good tea makers in the country who would probably be willing to enlighten the public on this subject for a much smaller sum of money.

Now, I wish to ask the chairman of the committee if it is not a fact that some twenty years ago—about that time, as I recollect—there was a thorough investigation made at very considerable cost to the Government on the subject of tea growing, and whether it was not at that time determined that, owing to the high price of labor in the United States, it would be impossible for us to compete with oriental countries in the production of tea? That is my understanding.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have no recollection of any experiments in tea culture having been made before these which have been inaugurated by the present Secretary of Agriculture. I think the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has got the silk-raising investigations confused with the tea investigation.

Mr. MONDELL. I know that there was an investigation on the subject of the production of silk; but I had the impression that about the same time, or later—I believe the investigation relative to the production of silk was more than twenty years ago, perhaps twenty-five years—there was an investigation into the question of tea culture.

Mr. PAYNE. A private individual in the State of South Carolina has been engaged in experiments in tea culture for a number of years.

Mr. SLAYDEN. At his own expense.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the chairman of the committee state how much money has been expended in the tea-culture investigations?

Mr. WADSWORTH. My recollection is that the first appropriation of this kind made upon the recommendation of the Secretary of Agriculture was $4,000; and the amount of the appropriation has been gradually increased to $10,000, at which sum it has been for the last three years. If the gentleman will turn to the report of the Secretary of Agriculture he will find described the character of work that has been done and is in progress. A tea farm has been in operation at Pinehurst, Summerville, S. C., in which this work has been carried on by the Department in cooperation with Mr. Charles U. Shepard.

Mr. MONDELL. I understand, then, that this entire appropriation of $10,000 is being expended in collaboration with some individual engaged in the tea industry in South Carolina?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The work is being carried on also in Texas. With the view of increasing the interest in this crop, a tea farm has been established in Texas, in the most suitable location that can be procurred, and agents of the Agricultural Department are looking into the question. The outlook at present is very favorable. Whether tea growing in this country can be made a commercial success will depend largely upon details connected with field and factory work.

Mr. MONDELL. Then I do not understand that any private individual in Texas has undertaken tea culture, but the Department on its own motion is investigating the question down there——

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is correct.

Mr. MONDELL. With the view of determining whether——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Whether tea can be successfully grown.

Mr. MONDELL. Then, as I understand, $20,000 or $30,000 has been expended in experiments at the tea farm located at Pinehurst?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mostly there. One of my colleagues on the committee [Mr. SCOTT] reminds me that the Secretary told us that he would probably finish up these experiments this year.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman feel hopeful that this experiment may be finished up this year with this appropriation?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes, sir; I am hopeful.

Mr. MONDELL. I wish to ask the gentleman further, whether it is intended to have this appropriation expended in part for the purpose of getting a report "on the cost of making tea," or is the experiment only with relation to the growing of tea?

Mr. WADSWORTH. We desire a general report on the whole subject of tea growing.

Mr. MONDELL. My last inquiry was directed entirely to the wording of the item.

Mr. WADSWORTH. We desire to find whether this industry can be made a commercial success in the United States. We are purchasing, of course, large quantities of tea from abroad. If we can grow tea in the South and utilize to that extent the cheap labor of the South, it will be a great addition to the products of our country.

Mr. SCOTT. In reply to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], I think I might say that the production of tea is in a large degree a matter of manufacture as well as of agriculture. You may grow tea of the very finest variety, and yet unless it be manipulated properly between the time it is gathered and the time of putting it on the market, it will be of no commercial value. That is the reason the words "making tea" were used. As a matter of fact, that language does not refer to the process of steeping the tea and preparing it for use as a beverage.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the chairman of the committee to yield for a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is it not true that the scant preliminary investigations made under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture have shown that the climatic and soil conditions entirely suitable for the production of tea have been found in Texas?

Mr. WADSWORTH. They have, and the Secretary of Agriculture is very hopeful that in a few years we will produce large quantities of tea in this country.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Have not his investigations in respect to the matter clearly convinced him that that can be done, and does he not feel that the additional appropriation is warranted.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; and to further investigate the subject in other Southern States.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I believe in encouraging new industries in the country and therefore have intended to offer no objection to the appropriation. I simply made the inquiry for the purpose of securing information on the subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

Purchase and distribution of valuable seeds: For the purchase, propagation, testing, and distribution of valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants; for rent of building, not to exceed $2,000; the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required, in the city of Washington and elsewhere; all necessary office fixtures and supplies, transportation, paper, twine, gum, printing, postal cards, gas, and electric current; traveling expenses, and all necessary material and repairs for putting up and distributing the same, and to be distributed in localities adapted to their culture, $270,000, of which amount not more than $48,000 shall be expended for labor in the city of Washington, D. C., and not less than $180,000 shall be allotted for Congressional distribution.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I will send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 23, in line 18, strike out the words "two thousand" and insert the words "three thousand;" in line 25 strike out the words "two hundred and seventy thousand" and insert the words "three hundred thousand;" in lines 3 and 4, page 24, strike out the words "one hundred and eighty thousand" and insert the words "two hundred and ten thousand."

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is to increase the appropriation for Congressional seed distribution to a sufficient amount to cover the quotas of the additional members of Congress who will be in the next Congress. As I understand it, the appropriation provided for in this paragraph is exactly the same appropriation which was provided for in the bill in reference to this matter for the preceding fiscal year. Now, in the next Congress there will be, I believe, 32 additional members over and above the number who are here now. If the appropriation remains exactly the same as it is, then, of course, the quota of the present membership will be decreased proportionately to the number of increased membership in the next House. My purpose and object is, by this amendment, to increase this appropriation to a sufficient amount to cover that quota, so that the quotas of the members of the present House shall not be decreased. This amendment is clearly for the benefit of the agricultural people, and I sincerely hope it will be decisively passed.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANDLER. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. The fact that we will have more Congressmen in the next Congress than we had in this does not increase the number of people in the United States, does it? Therefore, there will be no necessity for an additional increase in the appropriation for the distribution of seed. Is not that the fact?

Mr. CANDLER. The increase in membership in this House is because of increase in population in the country, but while it may be true that the number of people will not be materially increased by the next year I am glad to say that Americans are increasing to some extent within our borders, and I hope to see true and genuine Americans increase faster in the future.

Whether that be true or not, there is not a member on the floor of this House to-day who has a large enough quota of seeds to supply the necessary demand which is made upon him. At least, I know that is true in reference to the great agricultural districts of this country. I know it is true in reference to my district, for I have not a sufficient number of seeds to supply fully the people in my district, and I am anxious that they should have all the seeds they desire. The result is that I use all the quota of seed I have and then get just as many more as I possibly can from my brother members, who are very kind and often exchange with me for something I have, which they desire, and thus I supply my people as fully as I can, but even then not as well as I would be glad to supply them.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Will the gentleman permit me to suggest a remedy by which he may be relieved of his dilemma? If the gentleman will kindly inform his constituents what kind of seeds they are getting, he will have seeds to spare and seeds to burn and seeds which he can not get rid of. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANDLER. The results show that the seed I have sent out are excellent. Has the gentleman any to give away? If he has, will he give them to me? If he will I will cheerfully and promptly send them to my district.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. "Such as I have I give unto thee."

Mr. CANDLER. If the gentleman will transfer them to me now, I will thank him for them.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. I am in the condition of the spirit that was going to give the world to the Lord if he would fall down and worship him. I have nothing to give.

Mr. CANDLER. Then, if you are in that shape, your people must have called upon you liberally and you must have responded promptly.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. I am returning home with the consent of my constituents. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANDLER. I want to furnish your successor with plenty of seed, and I am satisfied if he will send them out promptly and judiciously to his constituents, it will have a decided effect on keeping him in this House; but that is probably a result you do not desire. [Laughter.]

I ask for a vote on my amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I think the House will find that under the new and improved methods inaugurated by the Secretary of Agriculture there will be plenty of seeds for the additional 32 members coming into the next House, and I trust that the House will not increase this item any further. It is $270,000 already.

Mr. MANN. What are the improved methods inaugurated by the Secretary?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Economy of labor, etc.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CANDLER) there were—ayes 56, noes 37.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Mr. WADSWORTH and Mr. CANDLER.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 87, noes 42.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Total for Bureau of Plant Industry, $612,730.

Mr. DARRAGH. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 2, page 27, strike out the word "five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "ten."

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, for sugar investigation the committee allowed all the Secretary estimated for. He appeared before the committee and told us distinctly that that amount would be sufficient to carry on his investigations in proper shape. He saw no use for any further money in the line of sugar investigation.

Mr. DARRAGH. I interviewed the Secretary of Agriculture ten days ago relative to an expenditure connected with the industry of the cultivation of beets for the manufacture of beet sugar. He informed me that the appropriation along that line was exhausted.

It is a matter within the knowledge of the House that this industry is growing very rapidly, and that in the State of Michigan alone the amount of sugar produced now from the sugar beet exceeds the consumption of sugar in the entire State, being an amount equal in money to about $7,000,000 and over.

In order to make this industry still more successful, it is necessary that it should be developed and encouraged, and I can see no reason why the sum of $10,000 should be appropriated for the experimental cultivation of tea, which is purely experimental, and but $5,000 appropriated for the development of an industry which has grown more remarkably than almost any other in the country.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The making of sugar from beets is no longer experimental.

Mr. DARRAGH. That is true, Mr. Chairman. The cultivation of sugar is no longer an experiment in this country, and therefore I ask for the adoption of the amendment as an encouragement to a great industry that has already passed the period of experiment.

Mr. HAUGEN. I wish to state that I myself, as a member of the committee, offered such an amendment in the committee, and the Secretary of Agriculture was requested to appear before the committee. He did appear and made the statement that the investigation was complete, and that all that was necessary now for this purpose was $5,000, simply to employ one certain man and to collect information and to disseminate the information that they already had upon the subject by publication.

Now, I submit to the gentleman that $10,000 is certainly inadequate, if we are to proceed along the lines indicated by the gentleman from Michigan, and that we should have a much larger appropriation. We are importing annually $100,000,000 worth of sugar, and if the matter is worthy of any consideration whatever, it is certainly worthy of more consideration than the pitiful sum of $10,000; but in view of the statement made by the Secretary of Agriculture, the Committee on Agriculture deemed the amount recommended by the Secretary adequate to the purpose at the present time. An increase of $5,000 would be absolutely as inadequate as the $5,000 appropriated by the committee. If we are to increase the appropriation, let us increase it and make it mean something toward the development of one of the greatest industries of this country.

Mr. DARRAGH. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question. He referred to keeping one man in the field. It was my desire to get a man at the Bureau who could go down and make an examination for the organization of a new factory in my district. There was no man in the field except Mr. Saylor. The only way I could get him, after the Secretary stated there was absolutely no money in that fund, was to say to the Secretary of Agriculture, "Do not stop on account of the expense; I will take care of the expenses of Mr. Saylor if you will send him to Travis City." Mr. Saylor at that time was at Omaha, I believe. He was supposed to be at Des Moines, Iowa. He finally reached the point and did the work exactly as we wanted it, and a company has been organized with a capitalization, I think, of a million dollars, and the probability is through that work, the very work I am trying to obtain a little pittance of $10,000 for, to develop an industry that has been pressed up to the extent it already has.

Mr. HAUGEN. I want to suggest that if there is any necessity for amending this so as to make it $10,000 why not make it $50,000 or $100,000 where it will stimulate and encourage this industry. I am as much an enthusiast in the growth of the sugar beet as any man in this country, but I suppose that $10,000 is an absolutely inadequate encouragement to this industry. And if it is the policy of this country through the Agricultural Department to encourage this industry, why not make the sum appropriated an amount that means something and that will accomplish something.

Mr. SCOTT. In reply to the remarks just made by the gentleman from Michigan, I wish to say the committee gave just exactly what the Secretary recommended. The gentleman from Michigan has stated that he told the Secretary they wanted an expert sent to a certain point in Iowa where an organization was to be made for the benefit of a big beet-sugar factory. He secured the attendance of such an expert, and as a result, perhaps, or at least it contributing to that result, the factory was established. Well, that man's work is exactly what the Secretary of Agriculture told the committee he desired this appropriation for, to study the matter of making sugar from beets, to help develop the industry in this country. The Secretary believes that this industry should be taken care of by private enterprise, and is being taken care of in that manner; that the only function the Government can occupy toward it is to keep one expert whose duty it shall be to keep himself fully posted on all developments in regard to the industry, and to publish from time to time such information as might be called for, and in every way to contribute his personal influence and information to the development of that industry. For that work the Secretary recommended that an appropriation of $5,000 be made, and it was done on his recommendation.

Mr. HAUGEN. Is it not also true that one of the scientists of the Department gave a very discouraging report as to the development of the beet-sugar industry.

Mr. SCOTT. I do not remember of such a report coming before our committee. On the contrary, my recollection is that the last reports regarding the beet-sugar industry were highly encouraging.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I hold in my hand a publication on the beet-sugar industry of the United States. It is in the form of an agricultural bulletin. I find this, on turning to page 26:

The recent census shows the rapid growth of the beet-sugar industry in this country. Thirty-one factories had been established before the end of the century. Since that time 11 other factories have been put in operation, located at the following places, and having the daily capacities named: Lyons, N. Y., 600 tons; Loveland, Colo., 1,000 tons; Rockyford, Colo., 1,000 tons; Sugar City, Colo., 500 tons; Bingham Canyon, Utah, 350 tons, Provo, Utah, 350 tons; Logan, Colo., 400 tons; Lansing, Mich., 600 tons; Saginaw, Mich., 600 tons; Salzburg, Mich., 400 tons; Menomonee Falls, Wis., 500 tons.

At the following places factories are either in process of erection or preparations have been made for building in 1902: Sebewaing, Mich., 600 tons, Carrollton, Mich., 600 tons; Mount Clemens, Mich., 600 tons; Croswell, Mich., 600 tons; Greeley, Colo., 800 tons; Eaton, Colo., 500 tons; Fort Collins, Colo., 500 tons.

Then it goes on and gives a list of the factories that already exist in the United States at different points.

Mr. HAUGEN. Now, I take it, our worthy chairman concedes that the rapid growth of the great beet-sugar industry is largely due to Congress and the encouragement that it has given for its development by the Agricultural Department. While that is true, and it is a great industry in which there is a great deal of cash money invested, we have paid for sugar an amount which exceeds the total output of all the gold and silver mines of the United States; yet here we are making an appropriation of a little sum of $5,000 to encourage that great industry. I say if we are to make so small an appropriation, why not wipe it out entirely from this bill? If it is the policy of the Government to encourage this great industry, why not give it a sum that will accomplish something? Why not give it $50,000 or $100,000 appropriation?

Mr. WADSWORTH. What will be done with the money when the Secretary says he has no use for more than the sum we have appropriated?

Mr. HAUGEN. Why, the Secretary and myself might differ as to that, my friend. But if $5,000 is to accomplish something, $50,000 will accomplish more; and therefore I move to amend the amendment by making it $50,000.

Mr. DARRAGH. I accept the amendment.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Is not all that beet-sugar industry now in the hands of a combine?

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say something upon this amendment. I would hesitate to vote for a proposition which would have any tendency to deter the growth of the great sugar-beet industry in the State of Michigan, or to go counter to the interest of any great enterprise in that State; but the language of the statute, the language in the appropriation bill, must necessarily be changed before a larger sum can be used than that recommended by the committee. Indeed, the appropriation here is to do certain named and enumerated things, and the Secretary informed the committee that the only thing he could do under the present policy was to disseminate the information now obtained and now accessible to those who desire it and to carry out little suggestions and experiments like the one suggested by my friend from Michigan.

Now, that is all the Secretary can use, and unless there is some larger plan, some other plan of further investigation and further encouragement of this great industry, it will be perfectly idle to increase the appropriation to $10,000, or to $50,000, or to any other sum, because the Secretary is limited by the language of the appropriation itself as to what use shall be made of the $5,000 asked for by the Secretary of Agriculture and recommended by the committee. Unless the Secretary of Agriculture, or the chief of this Department, or some one else, has some plan by which the industry may be stimulated and assisted, I submit to gentlemen on this floor that it would be idle to make a larger appropriation than asked for by the Secretary of Agriculture, and to make an appropriation that he says he would have no use for and could not use it if made. Therefore, I hope my colleague from Michigan will withdraw his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DARRAGH].

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I offered an amendment to the amendment making it $50,000.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection the amendment will be modified to that extent.

There was no objection.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Now, Mr. Chairman, when the Secretary of Agriculture tells us point-blank—and we had him before us on this very proposition—that he could not use this appropriation if made, what is the use of putting it in his hands?

The question was taken on the amendment and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I now offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of the paragraph the following:

"That it shall be unlawful for any transportation company, after July 1, 1903, to offer for entry at any port in the United States any trees, plants, shrubs, vines, grafts, cuttings, and buds, commonly known as nursery stock, unless accompanied by a certificate of inspection by a qualified expert of the country from which the exportation was made, officially appointed by the government thereof, certifying that the contents have been carefully examined and found apparently free from all insect and fungous or other disease dangerously injurious to nursery stock.

"In case any nursery goods are offered for entry at any port of the United States without said certificate, as herein prescribed, it shall be the duty of the collector immediately to notify the Secretary of Agriculture, who shall arrange for inspection to be made at the expense of the importer, who shall pay therefor a fee to be fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture, and said collector shall not allow them to pass within the jurisdiction of the United States until a satisfactory certificate of inspection has been received. And after the aforesaid date, July 1, 1903, all nursery stock imported in accordance with the aforesaid regulations shall be free from all further inspection, quarantine, or restriction in interstate commerce: Provided, however, That the Secretary of Agriculture may, in his discretion, order specific examinations, and may also, at any time, relieve such articles from inspection by a specific order.

"SEC. 2. That whenever it shall appear to the Secretary of Agriculture that any nursery stock or variety of fruit grown in an infested district outside of the United States is being, or is about to be, imported into the United States, and such nursery stock or variety of fruit is infested by any seriously injurious insect or disease, which insect or disease is liable to become established in the United States and seriously affect any such nursery stock or variety of fruit grown therein, he shall have authority to quarantine against any such importations and prevent the same until such time as it may appear to him that any such insect or disease has become exterminated in the country or district from which such fruit or nursery stock is being, or is about to be, imported, when he may withdraw the quarantine, and this shall operate to relieve all such nursery stock or fruit from such further quarantine or restriction as is provided for in this section so long as the conditions of freedom from seriously injurious insects or disease shall continue.

"SEC. 3. That the Secretary of Agriculture may designate, in each State and Territory and in the District of Columbia, qualified experts, with authority to examine all nursery stock about to be transported from one State or Territory or the District of Columbia into another State or Territory or the District of Columbia, and issue their certificates stating the results of such examinations.

"The Secretary may publish rules and regulations prescribing the terms and conditions under which such experts may act. These examinations shall be made, so far as possible, between June 1 and September 1 of each year, in the manner prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture; and if such nursery stock is found to be apparently free from dangerously injurious insects or diseases, the certificate of the authorized expert making such examination and finding shall be issued to the owner or owners of such nursery stock, a copy of which certificate shall be attached to and accompany each carload, box, bale, or package, and when so attached and accompanying shall operate to release all such nursery stock from further inspection, quarantine, or restriction in interstate commerce.

"SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any person, persons, or corporation to deliver to any other person, persons, or corporation, or to the postal service of the United States (except for scientific purposes by permission of the Secretary of Agriculture), for transportation from one State or Territory or the District of Columbia to any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia, or for exportation to any foreign country, any trees, plants, shrubs, vines, or other nursery stock which have not been examined in accordance with the provisions of section 3 of this act, or which, on said examination, have been declared by the inspector to be infested with dangerously injurious insects or diseases. Any person, persons, firm, or corporation who shall forge, counterfeit, or knowingly alter, deface, or destroy any certificate or copy thereof, as provided for in this act and in the regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture, or shall in any way violate the provisions of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on a conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not to exceed $500 nor less than $200, or by imprisonment not to exceed one year, or both, at the discretion of the court.

"SEC. 5. That the rules and regulations herein provided for shall be promulgated on or before the 1st day of July in each year.

"SEC. 6. That the sum of $50,000, to be available on the 1st day of May, 1902, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

"SEC. 7. That this act shall take effect on and after the 30th day of June, 1903.

"SEC. 8. That the provisions of this act shall not apply in interstate commerce to florists' greenhouse trees, shrubs, plants, and bulbs, commonly known as florists' stock."

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, to that amendment I raise the point of order.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state that this is the bill commonly known as the "nursery quarantine bill." It is a bill that has been agreed upon by the nurserymen of the country, by the scientists, and by the Agricultural Department, and is a bill that the country and the people at large is much interested in.

Resolutions adopted by the American Association of Nurserymen at Milwaukee, June 12, 1902, at their annual convention.

Having suffered from the increasing numbers of insect pests and plant diseases, whose ravages already cost the fruit growing and nursery interests of the country untold and yearly increasing millions, and believing that Federal quarantine regulations restricting the free transportation of infected fruits and plants in interstate and foreign commerce offer the only effective means of hindering the spread of such destructive pests and diseases: Therefore, we, the American Association of Nurserymen, in annual convention assembled, hereby resolve—

First. We believe that a well-guarded Federal quarantine law regulating both foreign and interstate commerce in fruits and plants offers our greatest hope of relief.

Second. We favor the passage of House bill No. 10999, now pending in the House of Representatives, and ask our Representatives and Senators to favor its prompt enactment into law without amendment.

Third. The secretary of this association is hereby authorized and directed to promptly transmit an official copy of these resolutions to each Representative and Senator in Congress now in session in Washington.

Adopted unanimously.

Various State associations have adopted resolutions favoring the passage of H. R. 10999. I introduced this bill in the first session of this Congress. The bill was referred to the Committee on Agriculture. The bill has been unanimously reported back to the House by that committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the question is on the point of order raised by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HAUGEN. I was coming to that directly. I want to say that the bill is subject to point of order, and in view of the fact that there is opposition to the bill in the House I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

To investigate the chemical composition of sugar-producing plants in the United States and its possessions, and, in collaboration with the Weather Bureau and agricultural experiment stations, to study the effects of environment upon the chemical composition of sugar-producing plants, especially with reference to their content of available sugar, $70,500: Provided, That $20,000 thereof shall be used exclusively for the purpose of investigating, determining, and reporting the proper treatment and process in order to secure uniform grade and quality of first-class table sirup.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to come in after the word "sirup," in line 3.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, after the word "sirup," line 3, section 33, the following: "Provided, That if found necessary $1,200 of the amount hereby appropriated may be used for the purchase and installment of a new boiler in the Bureau of Chemistry."

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, during the late cold snap the boiler was found to be inadequate to heat the building and run the apparatus. This provision is in case it is found necessary to put in a new boiler.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

General expenses, Bureau of Soils: Investigation of the relation of soils to climate and organic life; for the investigation of the texture and composition of soils in the field and laboratory; for the investigation of the cause and prevention of the rise of alkali in the soils of the irrigated districts; the investigation of the relation of soils to drainage and seepage waters, and of methods for the prevention of the accumulation of and injury from seepage waters in irrigated districts; for investigations of soils in continental United States and for indicating upon maps or plats, by coloring or otherwise, the results of such investigations; to map the tobacco soils of the United States; to investigate the soils and conditions of tobacco growth in Cuba, Sumatra, and other tobacco-competing countries; to investigate, in cooperation with the Bureau of Plant Industry, the methods of curing, with particular reference to fermentation; to originate, through selection and breeding, improved varieties for the principal tobacco districts of the United States, and to secure, as far as may be, a change in the methods of supplying tobacco to foreign countries; the location of the stations; rent of buildings, not to exceed $2,000 per annum, for office and laboratory purposes; the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required in conducting experiments in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and in collating, digesting, reporting, and illustrating the results of such experiments; the preparation and printing of reports, drawings, and illustrations, for materials, tools, instruments, apparatus, gas and electric current, furniture, supplies, for telegraph and telephone service, and for traveling expenses, freight and express charges, and other necessary expenses, $130,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I now desire to yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to this section by striking out the words "thirty thousand," where they occur on page 35, line 9, and insert "ninety-five thousand;" so that it will read "one hundred and ninety-five thousand dollars" instead of "one hundred and thirty thousand dollars." I send to the Clerk's desk to have read a statement from the report of the Secretary of Agriculture in reference to the needs of this Bureau.

The Clerk read as follows:

ESTIMATED COST OF PROPOSED SOIL SURVEY WORK.

During the fiscal year 1902 about $40,000 was spent on the soil survey with 10 survey parties. For the fiscal year 1903 an allotment of $60,000 has been made for this work, with 15 soil survey parties. For the fiscal year 1904, for which estimates are being submitted to Congress on the basis of the plans which have just been given for the continuation and extension of the work in order to meet the most urgent demands, an allotment of $120,000 would be necessary. This is based upon a total estimate of 243 months of field work contemplated by the above plans, which will require for its completion within the fiscal year 30 field parties, costing approximately $4,000 each, calculated on the basis of the work done during the last three years. Each party would survey about 1,200 square miles, making a total estimated area of 34,800 square miles, or 22,272,000 acres, in 38 States and Territories, which would be surveyed in that year.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I also ask to have read a statement taken from the hearings before the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Bureau of Soils.—An increase of $65,000 (from $130,000 to $195,000) is recommended, as follows: For soil survey work, $36,000. This increase is needed to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to provide for 9 additional parties, making 24 parties in all, to meet the great demands for the extension of this work. Work is being carried on with 15 parties in 25 States; so some of the parties are only able to remain for a portion of the season in some of the States. There are already demands from about 35 States for next year, and urgent requests that the parties remain for the full field season. For tobacco investigations, $15,000, to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to increase the number of working parties from 3 to 6, for the purpose of placing parties in Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, and North Carolina, in response to the large demands made upon the Bureau for work along these lines.

For drainage and reclamation work, $6,000, particularly for reclamation of alkali lands in Utah, Montana, Washington, and California.

For laboratories, $3,000, for the purpose of providing for the enlargement of laboratory work necessitated by the increase of field operations. For administrative office, $5,000, for the purpose of purchasing additional supplies and for other administrative expenses connected with the increase in the field operations.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of Agriculture has asked from the House an appropriation of $65,000 more than has been allowed by the committee. The work of this Department, the soil survey, is comparatively new work. It is a developing work, promoting investigations that have done a great amount of good in the agricultural sections of this country. The committee has not seen proper—and I do not mean to criticise the committee, but I differ with them—they have not seen proper to increase the appropriation over what was allowed last year. It necessarily can be seen that where you have established a new department that is reaching out in its investigation, it can not complete its investigation of many questions in one year; that it may take up the question of investigating the beet-sugar industry at this time—and it may take a number of years for it to complete that investigation—yet if the committee does not increase the appropriation, to let it broaden the area of its investigation, the Bureau must only partially complete work already begun, or else everything else must stand still until that particular work has been completed.

There is nothing that I believe is of more benefit to the farmers and the agricultural classes of this country than the development of this soil service. It is true you may scientifically investigate what is contained in the soil and report it and lay it before the numbers of farmers of this country, and it will be of no benefit to them, because of lack of interest and an unwillingness to try new methods; but there is not a community in the United States in which there is not some man who has got the energy, the intelligence, and the capacity to understand and take up the scientific researches of the Department of Agriculture, demonstrate its possibility and practicability, and when he has done so he is a living example and illustration to his neighbors; and those who would not take the maps or the work or books of the department and study them for themselves, when it has reached that individual in the community who is capable of doing so and developing along scientific lines, then you will have one, at least, who will make the experiment, and by his success will set an example which his neighbors will follow.

Now, to illustrate: In my own district there has been a soil survey. In the course of this soil survey there have been made certain discoveries which, if not prosecuted and the results disseminated among the people, will not be as beneficial as they ought to be to a large number of persons. On the other hand, if the money be provided to carry these investigations into other States, large numbers of the agricultural class will be benefited.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Let me remind the gentleman that the increase last year in the appropriation for this bureau was $60,000.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes, I understand that; but there is no increase reported this year.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the gentleman claim that there ought to be an increase every year?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the work is a success, and the investigation needs further development.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Let me say to the gentleman that this is not the last appropriation we intend to make for this purpose. We have been making these appropriations for the last six, seven, or ten years, and we expect to continue them in the future.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand that these surveys will go on if they are a success. The experiment is comparatively a new one, and, so far as I understand, it is proving a success. The committee demonstrates that this work is proving a success, because they renew the appropriation. A committee that is so wisely presided over by the gentleman from New York would never have reported a renewal of last year's appropriation if they did not approve of the work done by this division of the Department of Agriculture.

I say, then, it is shown this is not a waste of money; but I say that when you start upon a course of experiments like these you must not allow the experiment to stand where it is to-day, but must extend it into other sections, so that other fields and other States not already provided for may be benefited. So far as this work has been extended it has been a success. Why not let its benefits be diffused into other localities?

Sixty-five thousand dollars is all that the Secretary of Agriculture asks from Congress for the continuance of these experiments. Why, sir, we spend $65,000 here in an idle moment often by providing, for instance, for publishing some statistical book. At the last session of Congress we appropriated between six hundred and seven hundred thousand dollars to experiment with a submarine torpedo boat, and yet some gentlemen say it is not proper to give $65,000 for building up and aiding the agricultural classes of this country. Why, sir, as a friend near me suggests, it was only the other day when you appropriated $500,000 to stamp out the foot-and-mouth disease, something that was local in its character, whereas the work of this bureau reaches all over the United States, and is intended to give information to the tillers of the soil, the men who pay the taxes.

Now, to illustrate how much good these experiments are doing, and what the extension of this work may mean for the farmers of America in competition with farmers of other countries, I ask to have read at the Clerk's desk a portion of a letter that I have received from Professor Whitney, chief of Bureau of Soils, in reference to the development of this work in the South.

The Clerk read as follows:

The light soils of the northern part of Perry County (which you asked me particularly to consider, with a view as to their adaptation to crops and general improvement) have been found to be identical with the soils of eastern Texas, upon which we have this year produced a filler leaf having the Cuban aroma and flavor.

The report of the soil survey is being prepared in my office now for the printer, and this, together with the soil map, will be issued as soon as possible. I am planning to go to Perry County next week to inspect the work of the survey and to examine particularly the soils that are reported to me to be identical with the tobacco soils of eastern Texas with a view of putting a party of tobacco experts in the county to raise a crop in order to see if this surmise is correct.

Our investigations in eastern Texas, which have been carried on for two years, have resulted in the production on a particular soil of a cigar leaf with all the characteristics of the Cuban tobacco. The Department now has two soil survey parties in the area to map these soils, and it is confidently predicted that when the Department is able to announce the exact localities upon which the tobacco can be grown, that the price of land in these areas will advance at least 200 or 300 per cent and an exceedingly profitable industry will be built up.

To give you an idea of this, I would state that the best domestic filler leaf is grown in Ohio and Pennsylvania. These tobaccos sell at from 8 to 12 cents a pound, and even at these prices they give very satisfactory results to the growers. In addition to the enormous quantities raised in these States, this country annually imports about $8,000,000 worth of tobacco from Cuba, which sells in the market at from $1 to $1.50 per pound. This price is maintained not only on account of the excellent quality of the leaf, but on account of the small supply derived from the relatively small area in Cuba. It is reported that the Cuban growers receive about 15 cents a pound for this tobacco. It is well known that the tobacco importers and dealers of New York City are among the most prosperous class of business men.

If the Department's position is correct, that tobacco having the Cuban aroma can be grown on certain soils in our Southern States, it is going to be possible to produce at a cost not exceeding 15 cents a pound a tobacco which will sell in our domestic markets at from 40 to 70 cents a pound, allowing for the prestige of the Cuban product, which can not immediately be overcome. There can be produced on these soils of the South from 800 to 1,000 pounds of filler leaf per acre. At 15 cents a pound, which should cover all expenses of raising, fermenting, and baling this tobacco, the cost per acre would be about $150. At 50 cents a pound for the selling value of the product, which is certainly a low estimate, the product from 1 acre would be worth $500, thus giving a profit of $350, which, with a provision for the permanent investment, interest on capital, and other such charges, yields a very handsome interest on money invested. The small farmers will be at rather a disadvantage in that they can not handle their product as uniformly and as successfully as the large growers, but they can sell their product as it comes from the field to the larger concerns at good prices, and a man with money or a corporation with experts in charge of the field and warehouse work can cultivate a thousand acres in tobacco as easily as a small farmer can cultivate 15 or 20 acres.

There is another point which should not be overlooked; that is, that the Department has shown in the handling of the Sumatra leaf in Connecticut that its indorsement of the enterprise has put the industry on its feet in an incredibly short time and at prices far beyond what could have been secured by any amount of advertising by private concerns. It is therefore possible in the case of the filler-leaf industry to be developed in the South that the prices to be realized from this product will be very much greater than the prices above given, as the indorsement of the Department will carry much weight with the tobacco trade.

In the case of the Connecticut shade-grown Sumatra, after the soil survey had been made in 1899, a third of an acre was planted by the Department in 1900, which satisfied us that a leaf having all the characteristics of the Sumatra wrapper could be produced. The usual Connecticut leaf sold on an average of 18 to 20 cents a pound. The first crop of Sumatra raised by the Department sold on an average of 91 cents per pound. In 1901 43 acres of this Sumatra was grown under the direction of the Department of Agriculture and brought on an average of $1.20 per pound. The best crop brought $1.63 per pound, and the best bale brought $2.80 per pound. In 1902 700 acres were planted in the Connecticut Valley under the supervision of the Department of Agriculture, and the quality is admittedly superior to the quality of the previous year, and it is believed it will sell on an average for $1.50 per pound. The tobacco is estimated to be worth about a million dollars, and there is an indicated profit of about $1,000 per acre on an expenditure, without counting the investment in lands and buildings, of $650 per acre. The indications now are that several million dollars will be invested in this enterprise, giving exceedingly remunerative profits.

While the prices to be realized on the Southern filler leaf will not be so high as those realized for the Sumatra wrapper leaf, the cost of production is very much less and the profits per acre or per amount invested will be about the same, and I have certain information that a large amount of capital is ready to be invested in this enterprise as soon as the Department announces the completion of its demonstrative work.

Such constructive work as this is of immense value and opens up new industries in which capital can be profitably and safely invested. The preservation of crops through storm warnings and through the control of diseases and insect pests is valuable to the county, but constructive work in building up new industries in which capital can be diverted is of the highest type and of immense value to the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask five minutes more.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I have had this letter read simply to demonstrate what the work of this Bureau can accomplish in the southern portion of the country. If it can be shown, as it is shown, that among our poorest lands there is soil on which you can grow tobacco which has the aroma of the Cuban tobacco, then by the extension of such information you build up and enrich those people without bringing them into competition with any other of the agricultural classes of this country. By cultivating our lands in this way we compete with the Cubans, but not with our own people.

Now, sir, Professor Whitney states in the letter just read that he has found this soil in Texas, Alabama, and South Carolina. He believes there is a strip of territory running from Texas to South Carolina where this peculiar tobacco can be grown—not to compete with any industry of our own people, but simply to compete with foreigners.

If he pursues this investigation with the limited appropriation here reported—if he goes from Texas to South Carolina with his experiments—it means that every other State must be deprived of the benefits of the work of this Bureau until that experiment is completed. If he goes on in an irregular way from one part of the country to another, jumping over here and jumping over there with his investigations, then the people of important sections of the country must be deprived of the information which, if obtained, would ultimately be of great value to them and to the country in general. That illustrates the matter simply as applied to one section of the country. But in the Northern States, where the soil is adapted to sugar-beet growing, the same thing may be said. The farmers of Connecticut have been greatly benefited by the proof that they also can raise a tobacco similar to the Sumatra tobacco.

This great Government of ours, Mr. Chairman, is developing, is extending; but the Agricultural Department does not seem to grow. Without intending to criticise my friends on the Committee on Agriculture, we might judge from this appropriation bill that they believed the Department of Agriculture should stand still——

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I presented this case a year ago in very nearly the same language which the gentleman has put in the RECORD to-day, and if the gentleman will refer to the RECORD of a year ago, when this bill was under consideration, he will find that it corroborates what I say. At that time I urged upon that side of the House the importance of this tobacco investigation, explained the conditions in the Connecticut Valley and what had been done for us, but my friends did not respond. I endeavored to secure an increased appropriation for this division. I rejoice now that my friends from the South have seen the new light.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am glad my friend from Connecticut stands that way, but as I have only five minutes, I ask to be allowed to complete my sentence.

Mr. BURLESON. If the gentleman will permit just a moment, I would like to state for the information of the committee and of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HENRY] that I very ably supplemented his efforts during the last session. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. It is true that the gentleman did. I wished to say what I did only because the gentleman from Alabama was arraigning the committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, no.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. And I wanted to put myself right.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I am glad that it is generally agreed that this is a rehearing.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not intend to arraign the committee, because they are able gentlemen and gentlemen for whom I have the highest respect and regard, but I say they are not advancing, as is shown by the bill, as rapidly as is the country.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to one thing, for I am sure that he does not want to make a statement which is not true. If he will read the report of the committee, he will see that since 1897-98 the appropriations for this Department have grown from $3,182,000 to $5,238,000, an increase of $2,055,000. Last year the increase was $616,000, and the great bulk of it was for scientific investigation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the gentleman how much he has increased his appropriation this year over that of last year?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Only $29,000.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is what I understood.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In its report the committee says that in view of the large increases made last year it did not increase the appropriation largely this year.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. One minute more. You have increased this year only $29,000. How much more did the Secretary of Agriculture ask?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is stated in the report.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. How much is it?

Mr. WADSWORTH. $400,000.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is all I meant to say. I do not differ with the gentleman. I agree with what the chairman of the committee has said, and by his own admission he proves what I have just stated that his committee is not advancing but standing still, for an increase of $29,000 in this great Department practically amounts to no increase at all.

I ask you to listen to a statement which I will read of the appropriation for the Agricultural Department for this year (1903), the estimates of the Secretary of Agriculture for next year (1904), and what this bill allows for next year.

These figures are those in reference to the scientific investigations of the Department, and do not include the appropriations for clerk hire and salaries here in Washington, which I do not include, and which do not interest the farmers of the country except in so far as they have to pay for them, but the figures I have just read show the appropriations contained in this bill which directly go to the promotion and development of the agricultural interests of the country.

It is contended that since 1897, when the Republican party last came into power, there has been a vast increase in appropriations for the Agricultural Department. Compare it with the increased expenditures in other departments. In 1897 we appropriated for the War Department $48,950,267.89, and in 1902 we increased that appropriation to $112,272,216.08. In 1897 we appropriated for the Navy Department $34,561,546.29, and in 1902 that appropriation was increased to $67,903,128.24. In 1897 the miscellaneous expenditures of the Government were $90,401,267.82, and they had increased in 1902 to the enormous sum of $113,469,323.91, and now it is proposed to pursue this penny wise and pound foolish policy by refusing to grant an appropriation of $65,000 asked by the Secretary of Agriculture to promote the development of agriculture.

Mr. Chairman, one of the unfortunate signs of the times is the lack of interest the party in power has in the promotion and development of agriculture. We have often seen it line up in solid phalanx, with every member on that side of the House in his seat, to pass a bill carrying millions for some disputed claim of private contractors or to rivet the shackels of bondage upon peoples beyond the seas; but to-day we talk to empty benches—not even a quorum will remain here to consider a bill that is of the utmost importance to 40 per cent of the people of the United States. I am one of those who still believe in the old-fashioned idea that it is better to appropriate the money in the public Treasury to aid our people and develop our resources at home, rather than in conducting foreign wars for the subjugation of savage peoples.

Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that I have been interrupted so much, I will ask for a few minutes more.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I am very sorry that I can not yield any more time, as I have promised all the time I have.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LATIMER].

Mr. LATIMER. Mr. Chairman, if the Representatives from the different States who believe in the soil survey have had all of the soil survey which they need or think that the people need in order to develop to the people who live in the different sections of the country what the soil will produce, then it is useless to vote for this appropriation. For three years I have been trying to get a soil survey in South Carolina. The claim has always been made that there were not sufficient men nor money appropropriated. Now, this last year a corps of men was sent into South Carolina, and I am informed by Professor Whitney that soil was found in Darlington County, S. C., which is suitable for the growth of Cuban tobacco.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him?

Mr. LATIMER. Certainly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Six hundred and eighty-six square miles have been surveyed in the State of South Carolina.

Mr. LATIMER. That is all right. I am glad to find that that much has been surveyed and that results are coming from that survey. The point I make is that prior to this survey in Darlington County, in my opinion, not a man there knew that he could grow the Cuban tobacco. Prior to the survey in Connecticut not a man there knew that he could grow the Sumatra tobacco. Now, I understand that the growth of Sumatra tobacco has been increased until this year's crop will produce a million dollars to those people.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. And, I might add, without interfering with any other industry.

Mr. LATIMER. Without interfering with any other industry. That soil, as I understand, will not produce 10 bushels of corn to the acre, and yet I understand it will produce tobacco grown under cover that will result to the people who grow it from $500 to $1,000 an acre.

Now, do we want to grow rich and prosperous as a people? If we do, why curtail these little expenditures that reveal to the people the great riches that lie in and under the soil in the different parts of the Union? I say that we not only need to know what we have in the South Carolina soil that will bring riches to that people, but we need to know it in every part of this Union, and we want this appropriation of $65,000 asked for by the Secretary of Agriculture in order that he may send men into the different parts of the Union to make these surveys and that the people may have the information necessary to bring the results to the people that they are all struggling and toiling for.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the gentleman expect that this $65,000 will acquire all that knowledge in one year?

Mr. LATIMER. We expect to increase it along the line that we have been increasing it in the past. We do not want to sit still with the chairman of the Agricultural Committee holding down these appropriations, and prevent the people from having the information that they are clamoring for from every section of the Union. We want these appropriations made, that we may send men into the different sections where there is a demand for these surveys, that people may have the knowledge of the soil and of the crop that will bring remuneration to the tillers of the soil.

In the ten years that I have occupied a seat on this floor, I have not consumed the time of the House in talking upon questions that were not before the House. I ask this committee now to vote this appropriation of $65,000, that the Secretary of Agriculture may have the means to employ a force sufficient to send men into every section of this Union where the people demand to know what the soil contains and what it will produce.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will $65,000 send a force into every section of the Union?

Mr. LATIMER. This will increase the force. It takes about $4,000 to employ three men, and three men make a corps.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the gentleman know how many parties are working now?

Mr. LATIMER. Fifteen, and we want 25 or 30, or 50, if the people of the country demand it. We want to send them to every section of the Union and make these surveys, in order that the people may know what the soil will produce. I appeal to the House now to vote this appropriation in order that the members of Congress who are clamoring for surveys to be made in their districts may go to the Secretary of Agriculture and get these surveys made and in order that the Secretary of Agriculture may employ the men to do the work.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The question before the committee is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Then I will address myself to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, there is no sort of dispute or question amongst the members of the Committee on Agriculture or amongst the members of this Committee of the Whole as to the utility of the work that is being done by the Bureau of Soils. The only question is as to whether we shall run over ourselves in doing it, or whether we shall do it gradually and wisely and well.

Mr. Chairman, there is no sort of expert rarer to find than one who is a mechanical and chemical analyzer of soils, one who can examine and pronounce not only upon the chemical and mechanical qualities of the soil, but upon its adaptability to certain plant life. We have been training in the Agricultural Department young men who come from the colleges, men to do that work; because the colleges and universities of this country do not furnish them. There is complaint from the Agricultural Department now that they have not the men equipped to do this and other expert work which the gentleman would increase so rapidly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. One moment. We wish to do this work, and we wish to do it just as rapidly as we think it can be properly done; and in that connection the gentleman from Alabama has shown to-day what we all knew very well upon the committee, that this Bureau has been growing in geometrical progression, demanding one year $30,000, the next year $60,000, the next year $120,000, and the next year it will demand $240,000, if you consult only its desire to do work. It does its work well, too, for that matter. Now, the committee simply does not believe that the Department with its force can take care of that work at that rate. That is not all——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. One word, until I finish this thought. That is not all. If they would do double field work with double the appropriation that would be a different thing. But the proposition is to double the amount and not to double the field work. They came in last time with a proposition for double the appropriation but only 50 per cent increase of the field work to be done.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman said we could not go any faster; the Department was going as fast as it could.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. In the judgment of the Committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In the judgment of the Secretary. Has not he demonstrated that you are not going as fast as he believes you ought to go, by asking the increased amount that I have moved by my amendment?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Theoretically, the Secretary and the judgment of the Secretary is involved. Practically, it has not much more to do with the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture than the judgment of the gentleman from Alabama. These chiefs of bureaus make their recommendations upon their several lines, and they are generally adopted by the Secretary, and the Secretary has very little detailed knowledge of it if it is some peculiar expert business like this. I want to state this to the gentleman: There are 15 field parties working in the summer time in the North and in the winter and fall months in the South, so that there are practically 30 field parties at work, and they find some difficulty in getting young men competent to do the work to accompany the parties.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. If the gentleman will permit me, it was explained before the committee that it was necessary for these parties to take time to prepare the work. They could not be in the field all the time, and it was necessary for them to come to Washington to prepare the work, and the different parties can not be in the field all the time.

Mr. LLOYD. Is it not true that this is recommended by the chief of the Bureau of Soils?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Undoubtedly, and by the Secretary.

Mr. LLOYD. Is it not true that this chief of the Bureau of Soils ought to be well posted on the necessity for this appropriation?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I will take just one-half minute to answer. There is not a chief of a bureau in a department in this city of Washington who does not imagine that the entire Government is revolving around that bureau. There is not a bureau in the Department of Agriculture, especially amongst these scientists, who live in their closets—learned closets, interesting closets, closets of experts, it is true—that does not remind you of the old story about the man blundering at night who, instead of going out through the door to look at the weather, opened the door of the china closet where the limburger cheese was kept, and reported to his wife that he did not know what was the matter outside, but that everything was "as dark as the dickens and smelt like cheese."

Now, Mr. Chairman, I can say in absolute frankness that if we gave to one single bureau of the Department of Agriculture any one year every dollar that the entire Department is now expending it could be expended with benefit to the people of the United States. I will go further, and say that if we could give to one bureau of the Department of Agriculture the entire appropriations of the entire Government of the United States, it would result in great good to the people—if you want to do it that way. But we have to keep in view the coordination of the various bureaus in the Department and the coordination of the several departments in the expenditures of the Government. We may have made a mistake or we may not. The committee, I believe, was unanimously of the opinion that we are spending money as rapidly as we thought it could be spent wisely.

Mr. LLOYD. Is it not true in this case that the man in charge of this work believes that he could perform the work, and, as I understand it, he is one of the ablest chiefs of the office? Now, when this chief of the bureau that needs the money has got the work in charge, ought not he to be competent to judge of the amount that should be given to do the work. And yet we appropriate only a small amount of the sum asked for by him?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The chief of the bureau asks for the money and asks for it because, it goes without saying, that this chief thinks he needs it, and yet from that very chief of the bureau we find they are having difficulty for getting men for the parties at work in the field. There is a difference between facts testified to by the chiefs and a mere statement of what can be done by the bureau.

Mr. BOWIE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired twice.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I will answer this question; but I propose to yield time to others. I am speaking under the five-minute rule and not out of my reserved time.

Mr. BOWIE. I want to ask the gentleman who speaks of the coordinate expenses of the different departments of Agriculture and of the Government, is it not a fact that one-half of the people of the United States practically are farmers; and is it not a fact that the expense of the Department of Agriculture does not amount to 1 per cent of the total expenditures of the Government?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I do not know the percentage. And I would like to go further upon that line and say this: If we could just get rid of this fool "world-powering" idea that seems lately to have possessed the Republic and reduce expenses of a warlike character for soldiers and drums and epaulets to the amount actually needed, and appropriate that amount to purposes of peace and home development, I would be most delighted. If we could be spared spending so much money for totally useless and absurd and Quixotic purposes the funds for agriculture could be economically expended.

Mr. BOWIE. What are the total expenditures of the Agricultural Department?

Mr. WADSWORTH. A little over five millions.

Mr. BOWIE. And those of the Government six or seven hundred millions?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And this very committee that these gentlemen are criticising has increased the appropriations of the Agricultural Department threefold.

Mr. BOWIE. And it has done well in doing so.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi (continuing). And that is the very reason you ought not to criticise us as being stingy toward the Department.

Mr. WADSWORTH. This money can only be justly expended in scientific experiments.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And you must train the men for it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And you have got to train the men for it.

Mr. BOWIE. But they say they can do this; that is what they tell us, that it can be done.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I do not want unnecessarily to protract this discussion, but this is a matter of some importance and a matter that the committee has carefully considered; hence I trust a few additional observations may be indulged.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] advances two arguments in support of his amendment. The first is that the amount which he proposes to add to this bill was recommended by the Secretary of Agriculture. That argument has perhaps been sufficiently answered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who calls attention to the fact that the Secretary of Agriculture is only in a very general way responsible for these recommendations; that he must necessarily rely largely upon the chiefs of the various bureaus and divisions for information and suggestions along the line of their special work. If the gentleman will turn to the Book of Estimates he will discover that the grand total increase estimated for the Department of Agriculture for this year is nearly half a million dollars over the appropriation made last year, and I think there is hardly a member on this floor who will insist that we ought to grant all the increases that are suggested; that we ought to advance this Department at the rate of a half million dollars a year.

The second suggestion made by the gentleman from Alabama—and it seems to me the only one which needs to engage our serious attention—was that the experiments already begun and investigation already commenced under this Bureau of Soils must be continued in order to be of value, and he intimates that unless his amendment prevails they will either be discontinued or work along the lines proposed by this appropriation in other parts of the country will cease entirely. Now, I beg to call his attention to the remark made by Mr. Whitney, chief of this bureau, when before the Committee on Agriculture, and published in the hearings on page 191. In response to a question as to how soon he expected to be able to finish up this work Mr. Whitney replied, "I never had any aspirations to survey the whole country," intimating that it was a work clearly beyond the limit of one man's lifetime.

And further on, on page 192 of these hearings, Mr. Whitney made the statement that last year he had surveyed something over 11,000,000 acres of territory in the United States under the appropriation which we gave him then. In doing this he used but 15 parties, and the appropriation which the committee has recommended will provide the same number of parties during the succeeding year. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that we are going rapidly enough along the lines of purely scientific investigation when we provide for a survey of 11,000,000 acres every year, away in advance of the demands which are made, it seems to me, and certainly well in keeping with the needs of the country.

This work will be carried on by the appropriation which the bill provides without in the least interfering with the experiments and investigations already in progress, to which the gentleman from Alabama and the gentleman from South Carolina allude. These experiments will be carried on to a successful conclusion, at least to a conclusion, the success or failure of which will be demonstrated.

It is not the wish or the purpose of the committee to cripple any valuable experiments or investigations which are now in progress, and as a member of the committee I believe I can assure the House that there will be no such result if the bill is allowed to stand as reported. The Committee on Agriculture are thoroughly familiar with the work being done by this bureau, and they appreciate its value to various parts of the country and to the various industries of the country. They are not disposed to cripple it in any way, and it was only after most careful consideration of all the features involved in the case that they thought it best to bring in this appropriation, covering the same amount that was carried in the bill of last year.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Let me correct my colleague, Mr. Chairman. If he had looked farther down on the page he would have seen that Mr. Whitney said that he had completed twenty-one and a half million acres.

Mr. SCOTT. My statement was that 11,000,000 acres were surveyed last year and the survey is being continued at the rate of about 11,000,000 acres a year.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The question was asked Mr. Whitney how much he had completed, and the answer was twenty-one and a half million acres.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I am quite content to follow the Committee on Agriculture, which, my observation tells me for many years past, is in shape of making very good haste touching the work of this Department. I have at times thought, instead of criticising that committee for going too slow, that, if it was subject to criticism at all, it went too fast. I say this representing an agricultural constituency. I doubt if any gentleman on the floor has a better agricultural district than I represent. I am very glad to represent it, but I must confess that when I hear gentlemen on the floor say, here are one-half of the people for whom expenditures of $700,000,000 a year are made, and only five millions go the farmers, I can not agree to that. Now, I am a farmer myself. That doesn't catch me, and it doesn't catch my constituents. I do not think it catches yours, gentlemen. About 40 per cent of the people are farmers and 60 per cent do something else. Well, I suppose you may take the river and harbor appropriations. What are they? They are to facilitate the exchange of the products of the farm and the factory.

Farmers are quite as much interested in that as the balance of the people. Take your Army and your Navy, your provision for the public defense, the 40 per cent of our population who are farmers are quite as much interested in those matters as the other 60 per cent; and they approve, intelligently and conservatively approve, expenditures for the Army and the Navy and the public defense quite as much as the 60 per cent of our people who are not on the farms.

Take the irrigation legislation of the last session—far-reaching legislation. I thought it unwise; but after all I bowed respectfully then, as I bow now, to the majority. Possibly I was mistaken; but that legislation was along the line of improving the soil, putting water upon it, and the farmers are quite as much interested in that as consumers, and consumers are interested, too. No man lives to himself. No class lives to itself.

I have made these remarks for the purpose of introducing a statement about a little matter connected with this subject. It seems that it is contemplated to erect a building down here on the Mall to house the Department of Agriculture. It ought to be done. That is a valuable Department—subject to some abuses, as all departments; but it ought to be housed properly. It is carrying on its business now largely in rented buildings. The proposition is made on the part of the House to spend a million and a half dollars to house that Department—quite enough, as we already have the site. Yet, strange to say, I have had several letters from experiment stations connected with the agricultural colleges, and from people engaged in that work—I do not suppose that the people who have written these letters ever hoed corn or followed the plow for a minute in their lives—protesting in the name of the farmers because we propose to appropriate only a million and a half of dollars to house this Department. Of course, we shall appropriate twice that amount, if necessary, but "enough is as good as a feast." I have not had a single letter on that subject from any man who follows the plow or works upon the farm.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois be allowed time to finish his remarks.

Mr. CANNON. I wish only a minute or two.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Say, five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from Illinois be allowed five minutes more. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. LATIMER. Before the gentleman resumes, will he allow me a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. LATIMER. The gentleman has made the statement, which I have frequently heard on this floor from various gentlemen, that his constituents are farmers——

Mr. CANNON. Yes——

Mr. LATIMER. And that they have not written to him in regard to this legislation.

Mr. CANNON. I said who had written to me and who had not.

Mr. LATIMER. I want to ask the gentleman whether it has not been his experience during his long service in this House that as a rule the farmers very seldom, as compared with other classes of citizens, write to members of Congress with regard to legislation?

Mr. CANNON. That is correct.

Mr. LATIMER. And is it not true that they expect you and me, and every other member on this floor, to attend to their business and look after their interests?

Mr. CANNON. And yet, I must say that when we discuss political questions, the most exacting audiences to be found in the country are the farmers, and on the average they are the most intelligent audiences, and on the average, without speaking disparagingly of anybody or any calling, they are the most patriotic audiences. They keep pretty well advised as to what goes on. All they ask is good legislation—that which brings the greatest good to the greatest number. The people who make life a burden to members of Congress are the occasional cranks scattered here and there—not many of them, considering we have 80,000,000 people in this country; but very frequently the man who gives us the most trouble is the man who has an ax to grind, and always, in the grinding of it, proposes to get employment for himself. If we could be freed from the people who want to effect legislation and exploit the Treasury, because it gives them employment where they can not or do not compete with the great mass of the people who do not want employment through legislation, we should have much more time to devote to our legitimate duties than we have.

Now, speaking of the letters that I have had touching this Department building. What do the writers know about whether a million and a half is the proper sum for housing this Department which it costs $5,000,000 to conduct in the Department and in the field? Not a thing. What made them write? I do not know. Was it prompted by some real estate speculator in Washington? Was it touched here and there by somebody? I do not know. I am going to vote for a sufficient appropriation for that building on the merits, not upon the ground that people discriminate in favor of or against the farmer. I have heard many of my own constituents and other people's constituents say, "We will take care of ourselves if you will deliver us from the self-constituted guardians of the farming population who in our name want to exploit the Treasury."

Now, I think this Department is doing valuable service. I think, perhaps, it might have gone more slowly and done better service, but there are mistakes made in everything. Let us go along in an orderly way. The Bureau of Soils, if that is what you call it, the Bureau of Plants, the Bureau of Animal Industry, of pomology and entymology and so on, are all valuable and are all doing good work, but let us let them. like Topsy, grow a little bit; and where people grow somewhat upon their own motion and by virtue of their own merits, they do better work for themselves and for the country at large. I am not in sympathy with this amendment, and so far as my vote is concerned I shall follow the committee in its appropriation of $170,000 for this particular work, which I believe is double what it was the year before last. I get some of these books from the Bureau of Soils; I get books from other departments.

I recollect one book on ethnology from down here at the Smithsonian Institution which I received, and I have gotten about 65 or 70 volumes there, and I am glad to know that they are beginning to get out a book on ethnology which will be an abstract of what has been published. It will save me so much time, for there is no man who listens to me who will in the course of this life wander through those volumes. I would rather have one book upon the subject of soils which is prepared with wisdom and after investigation than to have a whole library made up by throwing a bottle of ink at a sheet of paper and then printing the work in two volumes, or three volumes, or five volumes, or ten volumes. "Small goods in little packages" used to be a copperplate after which we learned to write. There were various others—"Many birds of many kinds and many men of many minds." All through my life I have found that the men who condense, the scientists who condense and reject the chaff to save the wheat, who boil it down in this busy world of ours and give us much in little are the really great men. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I have already stated why I am in favor of this increased appropriation, and I would have nothing more to say on the subject were it not for the fact that I am afraid the remarks of my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] may mislead the House into thinking that we are making or proposing to make a vast appropriation. Now, I have great respect for the wisdom and the care with which the gentleman from Illinois handles appropriation bills and guards the Treasury. In my brief experience in Congress, when it has not been a partisan question at all, I think I have usually found myself voting with the gentleman from Illinois; but I am very much surprised to-day to find the vigorous opposition which comes from some of the leaders on that side of the House against this very small increase in the appropriation of the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will pardon me, I am following the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], one of the leaders upon that side.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Unquestionably, and a gentleman of ability, but with the committee on this proposition. Here is one of the great committees of the House coming in here with an appropriation bill, regardless of the vast increase of people in this country from year to year, regardless of the vast and increasing needs of the people from year to year, with a total increase of $29,000, and this in a bill which carries an appropriation of five millions—practically no increase whatever along the line of agriculture. When a simple amendment is offered proposing to do what the Secretary of Agriculture says he can do and what ought to be done in the interests of development for the farming classes of this country, we are held up before this House as raiders of the Treasury.

Why, Mr. Chairman, it is pitiful to believe that this great Government could be endangered by an appropriation of $65,000 added to this great bill, and for what? Why, not that this information in the course of a hundred years will not reach the farmers. Probably if we appropriated only $5,000 a year the information would reach them ultimately, but with a proposition which the committee says is good, carrying information that the committee itself says is necessary, the only question is whether we shall say, you must stop by reason of lack of appropriation and take double the time to convey this useful information to the agricultural classes of this country, or say that we will increase the appropriation by only $65,000, the amount that the Secretary of Agriculture says to-day he is ready to and can use profitably, and thereby uplift and develop the agricultural classes of this country.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I want to submit just a word as to the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that this committee did not recommend the amount asked for by the Secretary of Agriculture. We all know that the chief of this Bureau, whoever he may be, submits to the Secretary of Agriculture what he desires to have appropriated for his department, and he also submits the reason therefor. Then the Secretary submits these estimates to the committee. I hold here the estimates submitted by the chief of this Bureau to the Secretary of Agriculture and by the Secretary submitted to the committee, and the reasons for the increase of this appropriation over the appropriation of last year. And here was his reason: If the gentleman will look at the bill, on page 34, in line 5, after the word "life," he will see in the estimate that they add the new proposed work in italics. His new proposition was the investigation of the relation of soils to climate and organic life, and he added there the words "at home and abroad."

Now, that was one of the reasons submitted by the chief of this Bureau for increasing the appropriation. He wanted to investigate soil conditions, not only at home, but abroad; and farther down in the same section he added, "in the United States and insular possessions."

Now, it was the judgment of the committee that it was not necessary at this time to expend this $65,000 in the investigation of soils abroad, or to expend this $65,000 in the investigation of soils in the Philippine Archipelago or in our insular possessions.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. If the gentleman will permit an interruption——

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I regret that the chief of this Bureau should be placed in a false position here. The words "at home and abroad" were intended to include the island of Porto Rico or the Hawaiian Islands. Those were the places he had in mind. He has not contemplated doing work in the Philippines, as I understand, but he would like to do work in Porto Rico, and I think we can hardly say fairly that Porto Rico is "abroad."

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. I will not go into the discussion of that, but it does appear that this man has sent a man to Egypt, and if that is not abroad I do not know where abroad is.

Mr. MANN. Egypt is in Illinois.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. I know there is an Egypt in Illinois, and I recognize the gentleman as coming from there.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that that is the only recognition we have had in Illinois.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. The committee struck out that word "abroad," and the committee struck out the words "and insular possessions," and we struck out the $65,000 additional that he asked for, and I hope the committee will be sustained.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments be closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], to strike out "thirty" and insert "ninety-five," in line 9, page 35.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. UNDERWOOD) there were—ayes 38, noes 52.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were refused, only 17 members seconding the demand.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

General expenses of entomological investigations: Promotion of economic entomology; investigating the history and habits of insects injurious and beneficial to agriculture, horticulture, and arboriculture; ascertaining the best means of destroying those found to be injurious, including an investigation into the ravages of the codling moth and of the cotton-boll weevil or worm, with a view of ascertaining the best methods of their extermination; investigations in apiculture; investigations of the damage to forests and forest trees by insects; purchase of chemicals, insecticide apparatus, and other materials, supplies, and instruments required in conducting such experiments and investigations; for the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required in conducting experiments in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and in collating, digesting, reporting, and illustrating the results of such experiments; freight and express charges, and necessary traveling expenses; rent of building; for office fixtures and supplies, telegraph and telephone services; gas, and electric current; preparing, illustrating, and publishing the results of the work of the division, $65,500, of which amount not to exceed $10,000 shall be expended for silk investigations.

Total for division of entomology, $77,450.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, on page 36, in line 18, after the word "division," I move to insert the words "$12,000 of which shall be immediately available."

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have no objection to that. I hope it will be agreed to. It simply makes $12,000 available at once.

The amendment was read by the Clerk, as follows:

In line 18, page 36, after the word "division," insert "$12,000 of which sum shall be immediately available."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURLESON. I move to amend by striking out, in line 4, page 36, after the word "weevil," the word "or" and inserting "and boll."

This is the investigation suggested by my colleague [Mr. SHEPPARD], and the purpose of the amendment is not to increase the appropriation, but to make it more plain and specific.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The committee accepts that amendment. That is all right.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I desire to yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I regret that the appropriation proposed in this bill for the purpose of combating that pestiferous insect known in Texas as the cotton-boll weevil is not larger. The amount of damage done by it during the cotton-growing season of 1902 is variously estimated by those who have studied the situation to have been from fifteen to twenty-five million dollars. It was certainly as much as the smaller sum named, and it is possible that it may have exceeded the greater.

But great as was the disaster to the crop of 1902, it was nothing compared to that which threatens the crop of 1903.

We have been crying out in Texas about this enemy to our prosperity and commerce for nearly ten years, but it was not until the ravages of the pest threatened to unbalance the trade of the world that we could command the attention from the authorities which the vastness of the interests imperiled entitled it to receive.

The Secretary of Agriculture, an able, earnest, and honest officer, now comprehends to a degree the seriousness of the situation and went with me before the Committee on Agriculture to ask for money to enable him to cultivate a number of farms under the supervision of his scientists. He believes that he will be able to accomplish much good in that way, and I trust he may.

But I believe that he ought to have gone much further. I think that not only should this appropriation have been made, but that enough more should have been given by the committee and the Congress—to be available in another way—to tempt the services of the best talent outside the Department. There are able men in the country not employed in the Department of Agriculture who would, if a suitable reward was offered them for the use of their time and the exercise of their talents, engage in the study of the boll weevil, and from the employment of so many men of ability and learning we might indulge in even greater hope of finding a really effective remedy.

HISTORY.

Prior to ten years ago little was known in this country of the cotton-boll weevil. All that we are certain of is that it came from Mexico. In that country wherever it has appeared it has put the cotton planters out of business, or nearly so.

Over relatively large areas in which cotton was formerly a prolific and profitable crop in Mexico its cultivation has been entirely discontinued. This is notably true in the great States of Coahuila and Michoacan.

It crossed the Rio Grande into Texas about 1892–93. At first it made slow progress and did little damage, the reason being that at the point of attack there were few plantations of cotton and that the climatic conditions were unpropitious.

The boll weevil does not prosper in very hot and dry weather, and that is what it found in Cameron, Hidalgo, and Duval counties, in Texas. Three years later, having crossed a large intervening space where there is little farming of any sort, it reached the counties of Bee, Karnes, Wilson, Guadalupe, and Bexar. From that point on in its march of destruction the pace has been rapid.

In 1898 it reached Bastrop, Lee, and other counties bordering on the great central Texas black-land cotton region.

To illustrate the progress of the pest, I will print, in connection with my remarks, three maps showing the counties in which the weevil was found in the years of 1895, 1901, and 1902.

At first, as I have already said, the progress of the weevil was not rapid. That was due to the comparative infrequency of cotton plantations in south Texas and to the effect of the hot, dry summers. But when it got into the more humid regions of south central Texas, where it had only to cross a fence to get from one cotton field to another, it traveled more rapidly. How much more rapidly it moved under favorable conditions of greater humidity and more general cultivation can be seen at a glance by comparing the map of 1901 with that of 1902. It will be seen that now only Red River separates it from Arkansas and the Indian Territory.

My friends who represent the States of Arkansas, Louisiana, and Mississippi may well tremble at the prospect. When this insect gets into the Mississippi Valley, where the growth of the cotton stalk is so rank and the foliage so heavy that the ground is always shaded while the crop is growing and maturing, it will, I fear, be impossible to combat it. This fear is shared by the Secretary of Agriculture and he has determined to make a heroic effort to prevent so great a disaster to the country.

The weevil is now in the very heart of the cotton-growing region of Texas, and in the production of cotton Texas is the most important region of the world.

While we do not know with any certainty what the cotton production and consumption is in China, we do know, approximately at least, the production and consumption of the balance of the world, and it is well within the limits of truth to say that Texas supplies the people of the earth with one-fifth of all the cotton they use.

In 1901 the boll-weevil counties in Texas produced 441,810 bales less than in 1900, and the crop of 1900 was much less than that of 1899 in the same territory. But of course this decrease was not due to the ravages of the insects alone. There were floods and droughts to contend with also.

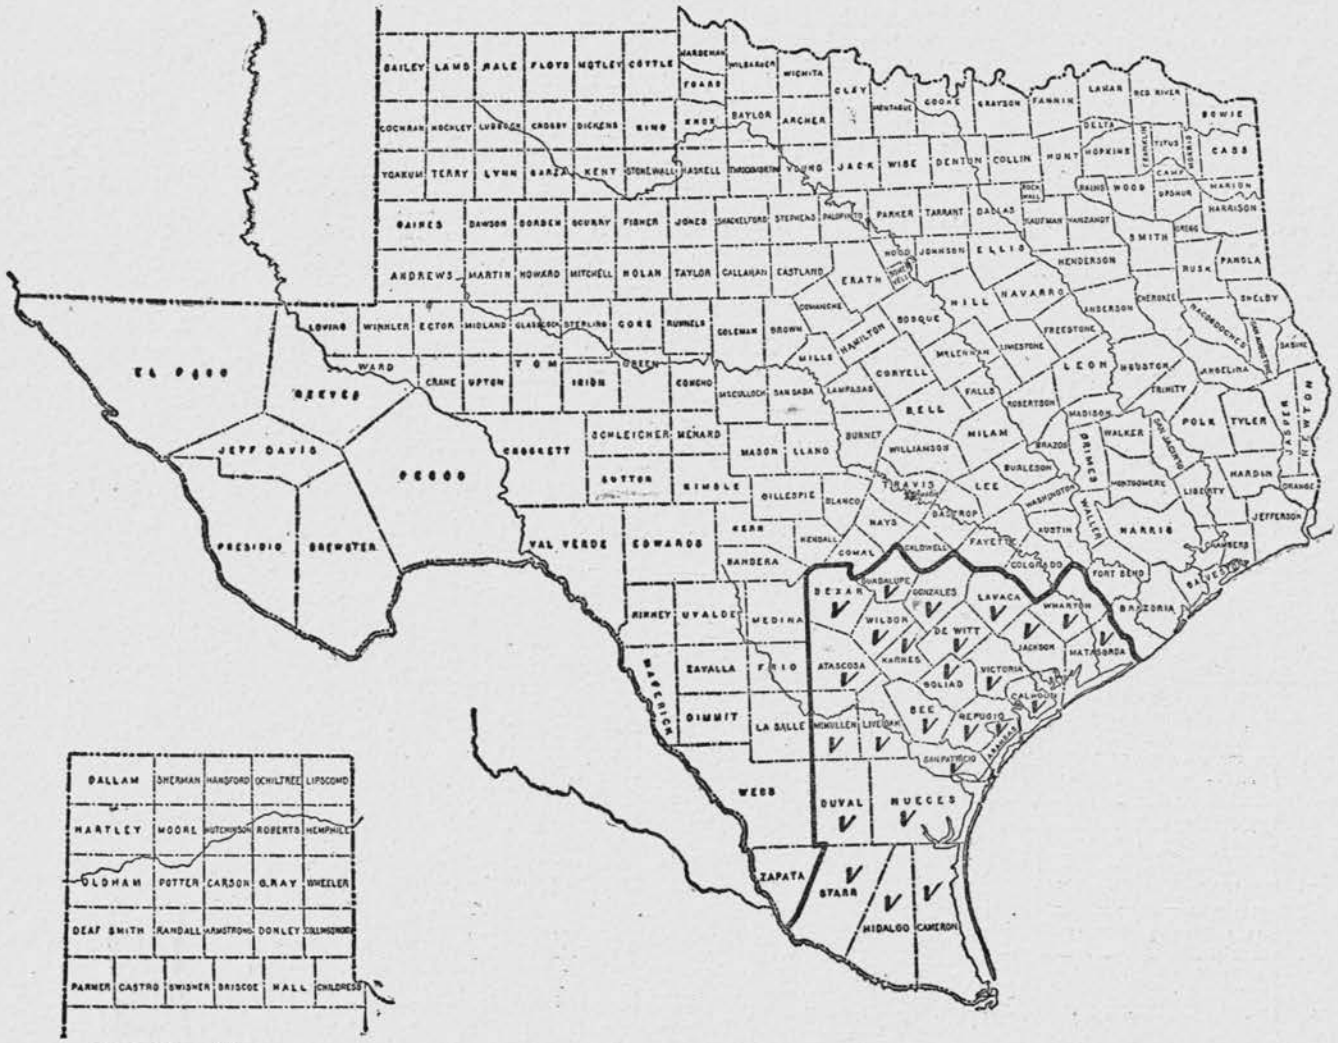
However, it is safe to say that two-thirds of that decrease was due to the work of the weevil. More than $6,000,000 worth of cotton was certainly destroyed by them during the year of 1901. The loss was very much greater during the year of 1902.

The Texas cotton crop and its by-products of seed, meal, and oil is worth $150,000,000 a year, and it is most seriously imperiled right now. To help save it this Congress appropriates the trifling sum of $35,000.

This is in striking contrast to the half a million recently appropriated to help stamp out the foot-and-mouth disease in New England. That appropriation was perfectly right and should have been made, but the one proposed to meet the crop emergency in the South is absurdly inadequate.

AN UNFORTUNATE COINCIDENCE.

It is particularly unfortunate, Mr. Chairman, that we should be called on to meet this dangerous situation just as the Governments of England and Germany are making unusual efforts to promote the cultivation of cotton in their colonies.



While we supply the world with the greater part of its cotton, we by no means have a monopoly in the cultivation of the plant.

Mexico, Central and South America can and do grow cotton. The Indian crop is an important factor in this great trade, as is that of Egypt. Scientific men and practical farmers have been scouring other continents in search of land that will produce cotton that will compete with that grown in our Southern States.

With intelligent cultivation the crop of China can unquestionably be greatly increased. But the most evident danger of competition is from Africa. The British Government, cooperating through its colonial officers with the landowners of South and West Africa, and with the earnest and intelligent help of the great spinning districts of England, has undertaken to make the latter independent of the American supply.

Through the courtesy of the American consul, Mr. William F. Grinnell, at Manchester I am in possession of a recent report of the committee on increased growth of cotton in the British Empire, made to the Oldham (England) Chamber of Commerce.

This committee addressed itself to questions as to the increase in quantity, improvement in quality, and experiments with American seed. They sectionalized the British Empire for purposes of more intelligent investigation and obtained reports from Egypt, India, central and south Africa, the West Indies, and Australia.

As to Egypt it was admitted by Lord Cromer, who transmitted the report, that only by an extension of the systems of irrigation could the production of cotton be increased.

Meager and unsatisfactory reports have been printed by the Oldham Chamber of Commerce as to the possibilities of Australia and the West Indies, but all they print shows that cotton has been grown and, of course, may be grown again.

As to India the report is voluminous and encouraging to the British spinners. The conclusion is that the Indian yield may be greatly increased by proper cultivation and care in the selection of seed.

The British Cotton Growing Association, also of Oldham, issued in October, 1902, a pamphlet giving the correspondence of the association with British colonial officers and others, from which I will print a few extracts.

Under the heading "Strong reasons why prompt action is necessary" it calls attention to the fact that the spindles and looms of the United States are being increased so rapidly that it is but a few years before the English cotton manufacturers will be put out of business by their American competitors if a new source of supply of the raw material is not found.

On the 23d of August, 1902, John C. Atkins, secretary of the British Cotton-Growing Association, wrote to the chief of the West African department of the colonial office offering to supply seed and implements (gratuitously when necessary) to the prospective African cotton planters. He also mentions that the association had previously sent out a cotton gin to Sierra Leone.

The colonial governors were instructed from London to "assist the movement for increasing the growth of cotton" and to give financial help.

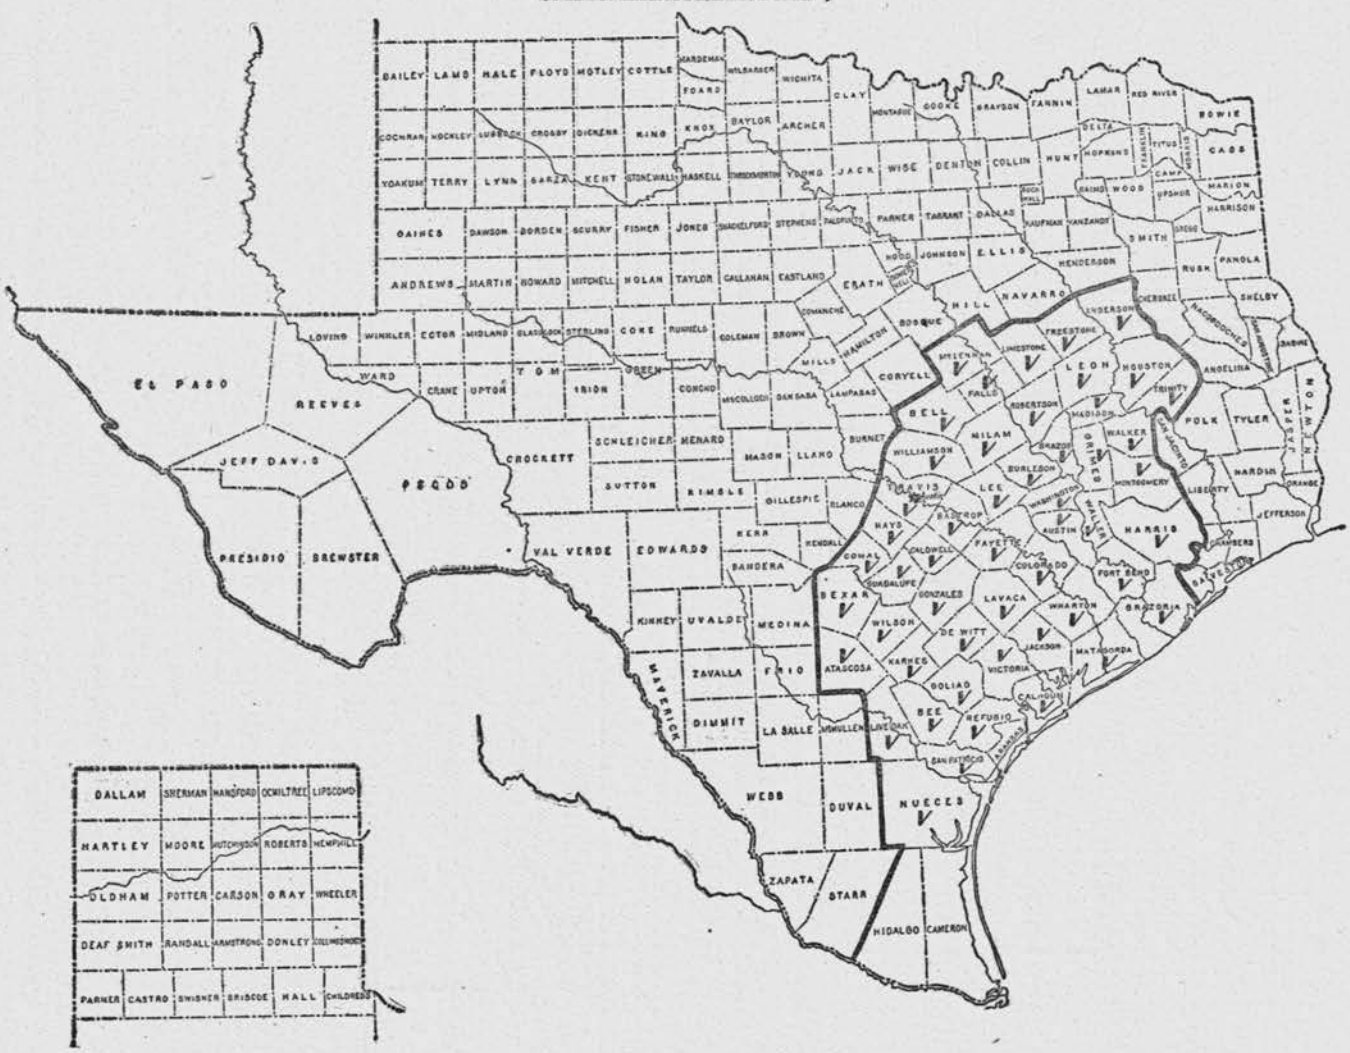
In a letter dated October 15, 1902, to the colonial office, Mr. Atkins goes more into detail and says:

(1) Expert cotton growers are being engaged and will be sent out as early as possible to Gambia, Sierra Leone, the Gold Coast, Lagos, and Nigeria. The duties of these experts will be to push the growth of cotton in every possible way by suggesting the best positions, by giving instructions as to the proper methods, and, where necessary, establishing experimental farms. The salaries of these experts (together with suitable allowances and traveling expenses during their stay in the colony) to be paid by the governors, under whose complete control and supervision they will be, and liable to be dismissed by them in case of necessity.

(2) The association will supply, for experimental purposes, seed and agricultural implements, and also suitable cotton gins for cleaning and presses for baling the cotton.

(3) It is proposed in the first place to send out a number of hand gins to the different colonies to be used during the experimental stage, and eventually, if the prospects of developing the industry justify it, to promote the establishment of power ginning factories at the ports.

(4) The association will also endeavor to find a market for any cotton the natives may grow.



Sir C. A. King-Harman, the governor of Sierra Leone, in a letter to the board of trade, says:

The cultivation of cotton, a plant indigenous to west Africa, could be easily extended to an almost unlimited extent and an export trade established if means could be found to gin the cotton in the native centers of cultivation. The machine for the purpose should be simple in construction, not liable to get out of order nor requiring skilled manipulation, strong, portable, and worked by hand.

Messrs. Platt & Bros. & Co., Limited, manufacturers of machinery, supplied the ginning machines free of charge and offered to send others without cost to other parts of Africa.

The unmeasured possibilities of cotton growing in Sierra Leone are clearly set forth in the following letters and newspaper clipping:

SIERRA LEONE, September 1, 1902.

Messrs. ELDER DEMPSTER & Co., Liverpool.

DEAR SIRS: I inclose a small sample of cotton grown from the seed sent out by Sir Alfred Jones to the governor of Sierra Leone some time ago, produced at Mabang. * * * It was planted the last week in May, and in less than three months had produced a crop. The Doctor informs me that the sample sent is not a fair specimen of what might be produced under better conditions.

First, the seed was planted rather early in the year. The best time for planting cotton in this part of Africa is the first week in September. Second, the soil was worked with the ordinary native implements, which only scratched the earth. Third, a large portion of the seed was in an unhealthy state, but he says that, having now got fresh seed from a crop raised on the soil, he will replant, and hopes for better results. What are needed, the Doctor says, for producing the best results are plowing the soil with the help of a mule and a cotton plow. Nowhere in Africa have these helps been employed by the natives in the production of cotton. The samples usually seen and from which the natives manufacture the millions of country cloths are cultivated with their ordinary tools or grow wild and prepared for the market with the hand. Their cotton can not, therefore, be compared to cotton produced in America under the most favorable conditions.

Who can tell the agricultural possibilities of Africa under the agencies and manipulation of civilized knowledge? If with Dr. Cole's limited means he has produced an acre of cotton in three months, why may not a thousand or 10,000 acres be produced at the same time with adequate capital? Liverpool, with the capital she can command, ought to be able to put on the Liverpool market by next September at least 1,000 tons of cotton, and go on doubling the production until she shall be largely independent of America. Dr. Cole has promised to write to you.

Yours, faithfully,

ED. W. BLYDEN.

In a subsequent letter Dr. Cole writes as follows:

If I had implements for plowing the soil, the yield of cotton to the acre would be much larger and the quality superior. I need one or two mules, which shall be the property of the sender if they wish it to be so, and I will produce cotton in their interest; also, a good plow and one root puller.

The Egyptian cotton grows excellently here on the Malang soil all along the extensive valley watered by the Ribbi River, and from my present experience I found that two crops of cotton a year are possible.

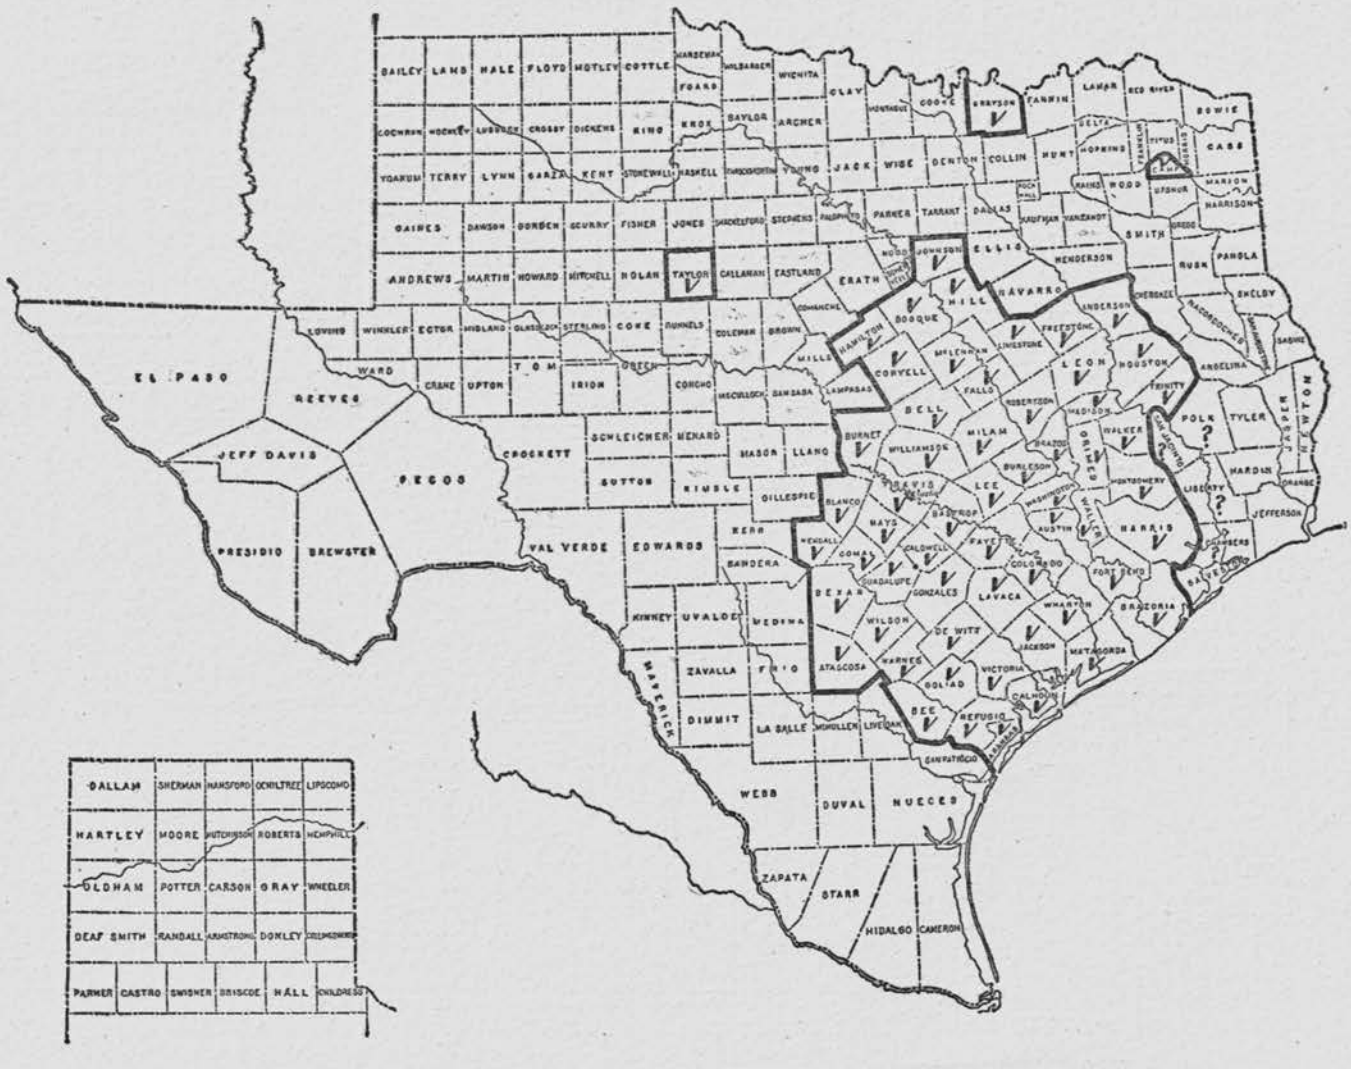
Extract from the Sierra Leone Weekly News, September 27, 1902:

The country is peculiarly adapted to the cultivation of cotton, an article which now seems increasing in demand, and his opinion is that the British Cotton Growing Association could not do better than take in hand for their objects the Bandajuma district. It is far superior as a cotton-producing country to either Yoruba or the Gold Coast. It is nearer to England, as large portions of it lie on the seacoast, and it is far more accessible than any other cotton-producing region in West Africa. Besides, cotton has not to be introduced; it grows everywhere, and the natives know how to cultivate it. Dr. Blyden made a journey into the hinterland some years ago and saw cotton growing. In nearly every village more than a sufficiency was grown for the use of the people of the town and the overplus was permitted to waste. He has seen stalks even from American seed producing good cotton for eight successive years. The plant, having no frost to interfere with it, is perennial.

From Nigeria the high commissioner sends word to the British spinners that cotton is grown by the natives of his colony, and that it has great strength of fiber and the qualities that will make a good yarn. He has energetically undertaken the development of the industry, and is aiding the new plantations with all the powers of the government.

Sir William McGregor, the governor of Lagos, says that cotton has been grown for many years in his colony, and leaves no doubt in the mind of anyone who reads his report that the yield can be vastly increased.

From Gambia and the Gold Coast the governors sent such encouraging reports that experts have been sent out to those colonies to inaugurate new cotton plantations.



British Central Africa is also a candidate for the honor and the profit of supplying English spinners with their raw material. Cotton of good quality has been grown there.

On the question of labor Mr. William Ewing, a Scotch merchant who trades there, says:

Labor is fairly plentiful. The ordinary rate of wages for unskilled workmen, in districts where labor is obtained locally, isonly 1s. 6d. per fortnight in full. Probably, however, workers would require to be brought from a distance, and I should think it would be necessary to calculate on, say, a total cost of 10s. to 12s. per month per man to cover traveling expenses, wages, food, etc.

From Rhodesia and north Borneo, from the East and the West Indies, reports of the most encouraging character were received.

The British North Borneo Company reports that excellent cotton can be grown, that labor is cheap, and the climate suitable.

An official (of the Government) sends a letter from Rhodesia in which he says:

COTTON TREES.

During my patrols along the Zambesi River my attention has on various occasions been arrested by the cotton bushes, which in some localities grow wild in great profusion. According to the native, the plant was first brought into the country from Portuguese territory.

It was at one time extensively cultivated at almost every kraal along the river, and coarse, but strong and serviceable, cloth woven by the natives. With the advent of white traders and settlers the industry practically died out. It is, however, still carried on in a few places, while the number of cotton plants growing wild testify to its former importance. The fact of the natives having at one time generally cultivated the cotton bush, and that it continues to grow wild for years after cultivation has ceased, seems to show that the soil and climate are extremely favorable to the growth of this plant. It therefore appears to me that here there is a field open for enterprise in the growing of cotton.

The labor difficulty would, I believe, be nonexistent, as at the dense population centers which exist in various places on the Zambesi River it should be easy to induce the native women to work by the day on the plantations, as is done in other parts of the world.

THE ANGLO-GERMAN ALLIANCE.

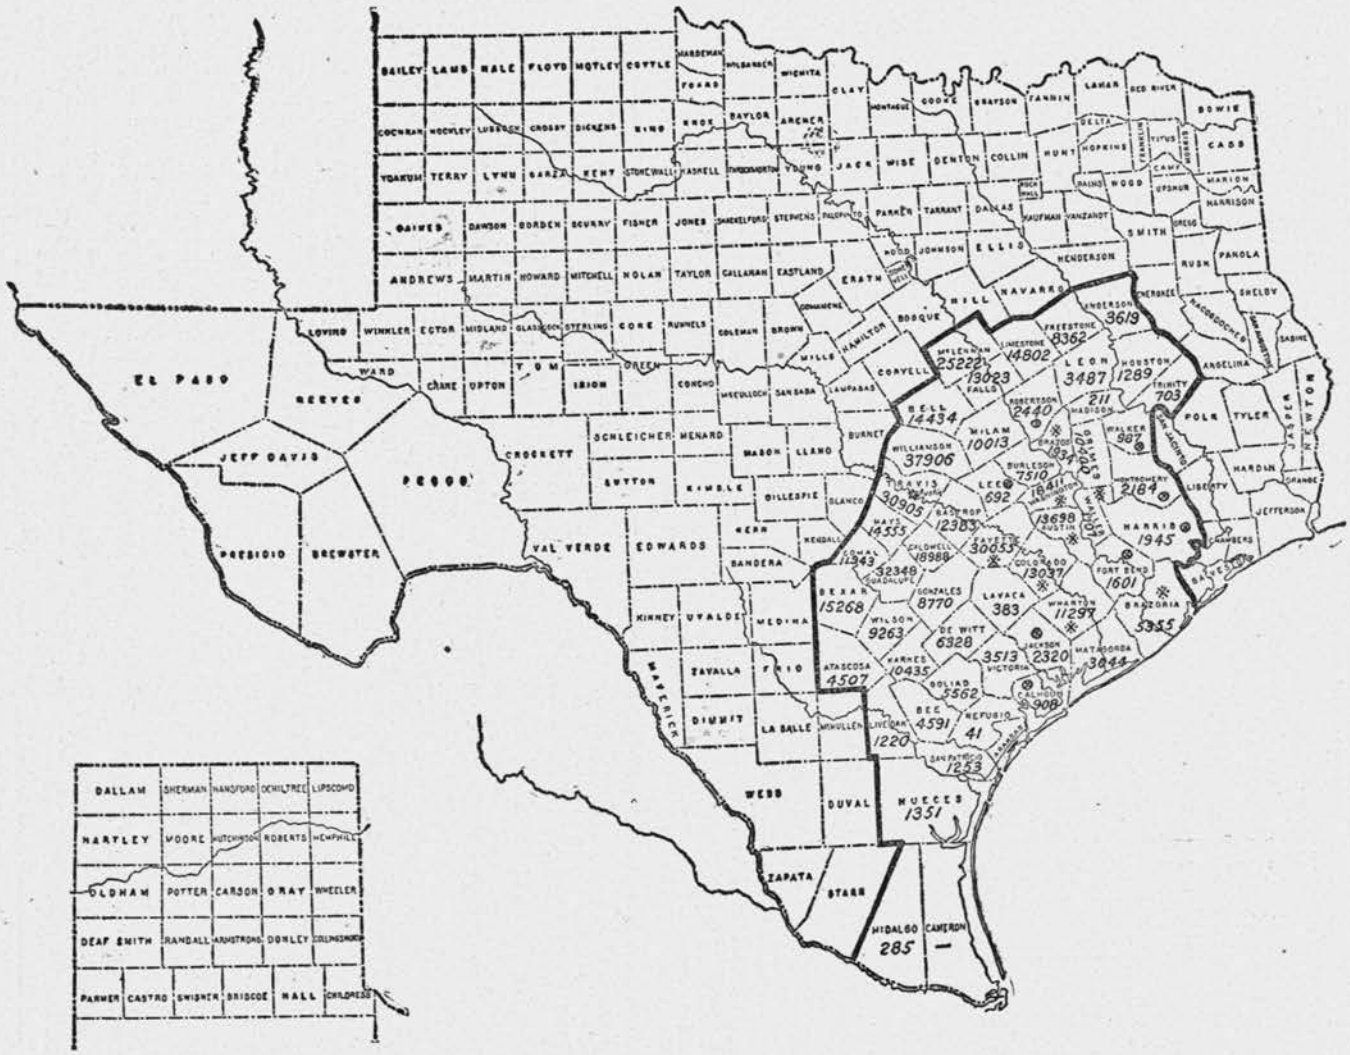
The alliance between England and Germany for the prosecution of claims against the little Government of Venezuela is only a political counterpart of that between English and German cotton spinners. Both are aimed at America and Americans.

The following correspondence between the British Cotton Growing Association of Oldham and the Colonial Economy Committee of Berlin shows the understanding between the German and English spinners who have the common purpose of finding cotton plantations elsewhere than in North America.

GERMAN EXPEDITION TO TOGO LAND.

A letter having been sent to the chairman of the colonial economy committee, Berlin, asking for information about the German expedition, the following replies have been received:

WEISSER HIRSCH, NEAR DRESDEN,
DR. LAHMANN'S SANITARIUM,
August 23, 1902.



Mr. JOHN E. NEWTON,
Lynwood, Oldham.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 19th found me here, where I stay for some weeks. Its contents were of the highest interest for me, since I was always convinced that the English and German cotton industry depend equally on a more assured supply of cotton, especially long-stapled cotton. It is a very precarious state of affairs to see a yearly consumption of more than 5,000,000 bales (Austria included) dependent on the good will of the United States and to see the overwhelming progress which American consumption makes every year.

It is clear that the Americans very soon will find out their monopoly and will prefer to send us goods instead of raw cotton.

The English and German colonies in West, South, East, and Central Africa are cotton growing districts catexochen. I received already about 50 bales Togo cotton, native, American, and Egyptian seed, long-stapled cotton samples from Kamerun and East Africa. In my opinion the cotton from native Togo seed is the best, better than American, especially suited for underwear. The direction of all the experiments for cotton growing in the German colonies lies in the hands of the "Colonial Wirthschaftlichen Comite, Berlin, Unter den Linden." I sent these gentlemen this morning a telegram informing them of your and Mr. Baerlein's letters and proposed a combination of English and German cotton-growing interests. As you see from the inclosed reply the comite is quite ready to comply with my suggestion and begs you to make propositions for combined action.

Samples of the different growths of cotton will be forwarded to you. The comite is assisted by the German Government, the colonial amt, and the German cotton industry. Our funds are, I am sorry to say, much smaller than yours.

Awaiting your good news, I am, dear sir, your most obedient,

EMIL STARK.

Copy of letter dated Berlin, August 28, 1902, to the Oldham Chamber of Commerce, Oldham:

"We have taken considerable interest in the endeavors of your chamber of commerce, in connection with other chambers of commerce and of gentlemen interested in the cotton industry, to promote the cultivation of cotton in the English colonies, and particularly in West Africa. It may perhaps be known to you that this committee has for some years occupied itself with the furtherance of cotton growing in the German colonies, paricularly in Togo (West Africa), and in German East Africa, by making practical trials in these places.

"As we believe that we can assume that the results of our joint endeavors for the furtherance of cotton growing in Africa are of equal interest to both of us, we beg to propose to you to exchange with you the reports as to the measures taken for this purpose and the results obtained. We have forwarded to you by same post, per book post, the printed report concerning the cotton expedition to Tango of 1901, which we recommend to your notice.

"We await with interest the favor of your communications, and are,

"Yours, etc.,

BERLIN, September 3, 1902.

THE COTTON GROWING ASSOCIATION,
(Care of Mr. J. E. NEWTON) Lynwood, Oldham.

DEAR SIR: Director Stark, of Chemnitz, informed us of the formation of your Cotton Growing Association and of the offer which you made for working conjointly with our committee for the introduction of cotton growing in West Africa.

As desired by you we send you by same post a packet with the report of 1901 on our cotton expedition to Togo, and we also send you sample of the four different qualities which were cropped the first year.

As regards the questions put by Mr. Stark respecting our cotton industry in Togo, we beg to reply:

The result of the first year you will find in the report, pages 4 and 6.

The amount which has been placed at our disposal by the parties interested in it is 79,000 marks (£3,950).

The plan which has been formulated by our committee as to the continuation of the experiments of cotton culture in Togo you will find on page 7 of the report. The estimate for carrying through this plan for two years amounts to 125,000 marks. This amount has again been placed at the disposal of the committee by parties interested in it and in colonial industry.

Any further information which you may desire we shall be glad to give you.

In accordance with our telegram to Mr. Stark, dated 23d August, of which Mr. Stark has sent you a copy, we now await your definite proposals for practical joint action,

And remain, yours, very truly,

COLONIAL ECONOMY COMMITTEE.
(Signed by Chairman and Secretary.)

I could submit further citations to show that in all parts of the vast British Empire where the climate is not a positive barrier intelligent men, backed by all the resources of a powerful government, are trying to find some means of escape from the necessity of buying cotton grown in the United States, and that the Germans in their colonies and the Russians in Central Asia are also in the way of becoming dangerous competitors of the American planter.

It will not do for us to sit down in fancied security. Our own spinners from year to year use a greater percentage of the American crop. This has alarmed the French, English, and German manufacturers, and they think that in order to save their trade they must either find a new source of supply of the raw material or move their spindles to the United States. Like sensible men they have decided to try to develop cotton plantations under their own flags and behind their own tariff laws.

The ravages of insects will certainly decrease the yield of cotton in this country and that will mean higher prices. Higher prices now and a decreased American yield will do as like conditions did during the civil war—force the cultivation of cotton elsewhere.

The development in South America (notably Brazil), in India, and in Egypt, which occurred in the sixties, is a piece of history which we can not afford to forget. We must not have another famine unless we are willing to see our supremacy as a cotton-growing country put in serious jeopardy or pass away entirely.

Elder, Dempster & Co., of Liverpool, shipowners and merchants, have agreed to transport to England, free of charge for a number of years, all the cotton grown in British Africa.

In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I will print a letter recently received from the consul-general of the United States in London, the Hon. H. Clay Evans.

I will also print some tables, compiled at my request by the Texas railway managers, which show where the weevil has appeared and the extent of damage done to the crops by the insect.

CONSULATE-GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
London, December 11, 1902.

Hon. JAMES L. SLAYDEN, M. C., Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to state in reply to your inquiry of the 29th ultimo that there is an effort being made by the spinners, merchants, shipowners, etc., to encourage the growing of cotton in Africa. This is, as I am informed, for the double purpose of giving the users, the consumers, or manufacturers of cotton and cotton cloths a wider market, rendering them, as they say, less dependent, and at the same time it is an effort to encourage the native there in habits of industry, thereby making him a producer, improving his condition. To this end I am told 200 tons of cotton seed was sent there as a present toward stimulating an effort in that direction.

I addressed a letter to Messrs. Elder, Dempster & Co. on the subject of transportation of the cotton, on the line of your inquiry. They have given me a very courteous reply, in which they say, "We have agreed to carry cotton free, with a view of trying to create a trade in west Africa and porvide the natives with some profitable employment. Of course if it comes along in very large quantities we would not be able to continue the freight-free system."

This I quote from their letter to me, signed by Sir Alfred L. Jones, who is the controlling spirit in the Elder, Dempster & Co. navigation lines. He is himself a very wealthy man, besides he has unlimited financial backing. He is known and recognized as a man of wide information, practical, and progressive. He has, during the past eighteen months, as I am informed, instituted methods and reforms in the island of Jamaica that promise much good for the people there.

Very respectfully,

H. CLAY EVANS, Consul-General.

Southern division.—Agents report from 30 stations, all but one (Meridian) showing the presence of the weevil. The earliest occurrence noted was at Rosenberg, south Texas, in 1897, and the latest at McGregor, central Texas, in 1902. Estimates of damage vary from 5 per cent at the point of latest occurrence to 75 per cent at Wallis and a few other stations.

Beaumont division.—Twenty-one station agents make reports. Twenty report damage of from 20 to 90 per cent.

Weatherford branch.—Three stations reported. One reports a damage of 20 per cent, one 50 per cent, and one that the weevil has not appeared.

INTERNATIONAL AND GREAT NORTHERN RAILROAD.

G. H. Turner, esq., general freight agent, sends reports from 19 cotton-raising counties on the line of his road.

All report the presence of the weevil.

The smallest estimate of damage is from Houston County, in east Texas, where the weevil first appeared in 1901, which is 25 per cent, and the greatest from Montgomery, Williamson, and Grimes, the latter three reporting a loss of 60 per cent through the ravages of the insects.

MISSOURI, KANSAS AND TEXAS RAILWAY.

Through the courtesy of J. W. Allen, esq., of the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railway Company of Texas, reports have been received from all the stations of that line. Fifty-two agents report the presence of the weevil, and that the crop was damaged in 1902 as much as 66⅔ per cent in counties where the weevil has been for three or four years, down to 7 per cent only in counties where it appeared in 1902.

SAN ANTONIO AND ARANSAS PASS RAILWAY.

This line, through its general agent, Mr. Martin, makes the following report:

SAN ANTONIO AND ARANSAS PASS RAILWAY COMPANY, TRAFFIC DEPARTMENT,
San Antonio, Tex., December 6, 1902.

Mr. M. D. MONSERRATE,
Vice-President and General Manager.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your letter of November 19, and returning letter from Hon. J. L. SLAYDEN, under date of November 18, I beg to give you the following summary of reports we have received from our agents at principal cotton-shipping stations as to the cotton-boll weevil pest.

The boll weevil has made its appearance at all points on our line with the exception of those located in Kerr County (Kerrville branch). The first appearances, and estimates made by our agents of the percentage of damage to last season's crop, are as follows:

Alice branch.—First appearance in 1892 and 1893. Damage about 75 per cent at Mathis; slight at Alice; presumably account of the dry weather.

Kenedy and Corpus Christi and Rockport branches.—First appearance in 1893 and 1894. Estimates of damage range from 10 per cent to 50 per cent.

Yoakum and San Antonio divisions.—First appearance in 1895 to 1897 and 1898. Estimates of damage range from 10 per cent to 50 per cent.

Kerrville branch.—A slight appearance of the weevil in Kendall County noted in 1901 and 1902, but no great damage.

Houston division.—First appearance, Lavaca and Colorado counties in 1897 and 1898, Fort Bend and Harris counties in 1899. Estimates of damage range from 33⅓ per cent to 80 per cent.

Lockhart branch.—First appearance, Gonzales County in 1897 and 1898; Caldwell County in 1899. Estimates of damage range from 50 to 66⅔ per cent.

Waco division.—First appearance, Lavaca County in 1898; Fayette County in 1899; Lee and Milan counties in 1899 and 1900; Falls County, 1901; McLenan County in 1901 and 1902. Estimates of damage range from 35 to 75 per cent.

Answering the last question, most of the agents report the general opinion that the weevil will increase, and if some method of extermination is not discovered they will eventually prevent the profitable raising of cotton in this part of the country.

Yours, truly,

E. J. MARTIN.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word merely for the purpose of saying that I am a member of the Committee on Agriculture, as my friend from Texas knows, and am the representative of the cotton States, being the only one from the cotton States upon that committee. The committee gave for this purpose every dollar which is recommended by the Department, and all that they said they could use at this time. I say this merely in justice to the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Division of Statistics, Salaries: One statistician, who shall be chief of division, $3,000; 1 assistant statistician, who shall be assistant chief of division, $2,200; 3 clerks class 4, $5,400; 4 clerks class 3, $6,400; 5 clerks class 2, $7,000; 8 clerks class 1, $9,600; 10 clerks, at $1,000 each, $10,000; 4 clerks, at $840 each, $3,360; in all, $46,960.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after line 11, page 41, the following: "Provided, No part of this fund shall be used in duplicating work done by the Census Bureau."

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. Chairman, the amendment is self-explanatory. We had this question up and it was fully discussed at the time that we created the permanent Census Bureau. This amendment is only intended to provide that they shall not duplicate the work done in the permanent Census Bureau.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. GRAFF. Will the gentleman from Nebraska be kind enough to inform us what the interpretation of that amendment is? Who is to determine what shall be done in the statistical line in the Census Bureau and what in the Agricultural Department?

Mr. BURKETT. That will be attended to by the proper disbursing officer. Under this amendment he could not pay out money for duplicate work.

Mr. GRAFF. I am as anxious as anyone to avoid duplication, but if the effect of this amendment would be to cast upon the Census Bureau the burden of collecting agricultural statistics I am against the proposition, because that matter was investigated at great length in the Committee on Agriculture, and we had before us not only the Secretary of the Department, but the Director of the Census, and according to the testimony of Director Merriam himself, he said it would cost tremendously more—I think $400,000 more—for the Census Bureau to gather the same statistics which is at present done by the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?
Mr. GRAFF. Yes.
Mr. HULL. If the amendment is adopted, could not the Census Bureau, by taking up any line of work, shut the Agricultural Department out entirely?
Mr. GRAFF. Yes.
Mr. HULL. And they will do it. It is a dangerous thing to put in the bill.
Mr. GRAFF. I notice the gentleman from Nebraska gave an answer which was very vague.
Mr. BURKETT. Oh, no. It simply provides that these funds shall not be available for duplicating work that the Census Bureau does. We have provided what the Census Bureau shall do, and if the Director has been before the committee and has said that he could not do it without being more expensive than the other Department, he is not going to take up that part of the work.
The only thing here is to prevent the duplication of statistical work. I believe, and the majority of the members of this House believe, that the various bureaus do duplicate the statistics which we want done and intend shall be done by the Census Bureau. Now, let us put in this provision—that if you do duplicate the work you can not have the money that we appropriate. A year or two ago I had something to say about the new Census Bureau. I said that there would be work that must be done in the various departments that you could not transfer, and I believe it is proper when we make a special appropriation to do statistical work to say to them, "You can not go on without any limit; you must have regard for the statistical bureau that we have created, and if you do duplicate statistical work you can not have it paid for."
Mr. GRAFF. Now, I want to ask the gentleman another question, whether this present amendment would not leave things in this shape: That the Director of the Census would be obliged to carry out all of the scope of statistical work which is given him by existing law, and that this would practically prohibit the Secretary of Agriculture from carrying on his agricultural statistical work?
Mr. BURKETT. I do not see how.
Mr. GRAFF. Now, if we are going to do that, let us know that we are doing it, and let us look the question in the face and determine it intelligently, and not adopt an amendment here which may operate as a surprise to a great many of us. I think we are competent to meet the question and determine it. When I entered upon the investigation of the question whether we could transfer the statistical work in the Agricultural Department into the Census Bureau, I started in with the inclination in favor of that transfer, but after a very exhaustive examination into the subject by the committee I changed my mind.
The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] is recognized.
Mr. HULL. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois have five minutes more.
Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I supposed I had the floor in my own right.
Mr. BURLESON. I believe, Mr. Chairman, I have the floor.
The CHAIRMAN. When the gentleman from Nebraska sat down the gentleman from Illinois desired to ask him some questions. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska had expired and the Chair then recognized the gentleman from Texas.
Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I do earnestly hope that this amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] will not be adopted. Its effect will be to practically strip the Division of Statistics in the Agricultural Department of any authority to gather statistical information with reference to the production of cotton, wheat, and other cereals. I am as earnestly opposed as the gentleman from Nebraska to the duplication of statistics——
Mr. BURKETT. Is the work which the gentleman mentions, and of which he apprehends the Agricultural Department will be stripped, is that work provided for in the Census Bureau?
Mr. BURLESON. Partially so.
Mr. BURKETT. Then, if there is such a provision, why should the work be duplicated?
Mr. BURLESON. I will give the gentleman the reasons if he will patiently listen.
I am as earnestly opposed as any member on this floor to the duplication of statistical work by the various bureaus and divisions. There can not be any division of opinion that duplication in this respect should be avoided. But, Mr. Chairman, I protest earnestly in the name of the producers of cotton and wheat against depriving the Statistical Division of the Agricultural Department of its authority to gather statistics relating to agricultural products.
I protest against this attempt to turn over this work to the Census Bureau. The reason for my position is this: For some years the Agricultural Department has been gathering statistics with reference to the output of cotton and wheat. Since it has engaged in this statistical work it has saved the producers of cotton and wheat millions of dollars. If there is any interference with this work now, it can only come because of ill-considered suggestions of economy, honestly made in this instance by the gentleman from Nebraska, or because of influences emanating from the speculative element on the New York or the New Orleans cotton exchanges.
I have as high a regard for the Director of the Census as any man on this floor. I have as much confidence in his integrity and his ability. Notwithstanding I am a member of the Census Committee, I protest against permitting the Census Bureau, if it is to become a part of the department of commerce, stripping the statistical bureau of the Agricultural Department of its authority to gather wheat and cotton statistics, and conferring it upon the Census Bureau, and that is what will be done if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska is adopted.
It is to the interest of all to avoid the duplication of statistics. One reason being that if there is duplication there must necessarily be conflict, and the people will lose confidence in their value. If the Census Bureau was to remain an independent bureau I would not object to this amendment, but as we all know there is a pending bill creating a department of commerce, and it is to embrace the Census Bureau, as I understand it. The Census Bureau gathering agricultural statistics as an independent bureau is one thing, but the Census Bureau under the department of commerce to gather cotton statistics must be viewed by me as an entirely different proposition. I will make my meaning plain. We all know there is naturally an antagonism or conflict of interest between the producer and the manufacturer of any given product. To illustrate, the producer of cotton and the producer of wheat want to get as high a price as they can for their product. It is to the interest of the manufacturer of cotton or the miller to buy the product they desire to manufacture as cheap as possible. Now, if the Statistical Division of the Agricultural Department is deprived of its present authority—if this authority is given to the Census Bureau—and if the Census Bureau is to be covered under the department of commerce, and a man should be placed at the head of the department of commerce who would magnify the importance of the manufacturing interests of these products, unquestionably the interests of the producers of cotton and wheat would suffer if the gathering of these statistics were given to the Census Bureau.
It is reasonable to believe that the commercial or manufacturing interests will ultimately dominate in the department of commerce. If the Census Bureau is to be placed under the department of commerce, as a representative of the producers of cotton I shall oppose the transfer of the Statistical Division of the Agricultural Department to the Census Bureau at all times, because I believe that if it is so transferred ultimately the commercial interests or the manufacturing interests will dominate that great department and the interests of the producers will suffer.
Mr. MADDOX. Will the gentleman allow me a question?
Mr. BURLESON. Yes, sir.
Mr. MADDOX. What was your argument in favor of the creation of the Census Bureau?
Mr. BURLESON. I wanted to prevent the duplication of statistical work; and I state now——
Mr. MADDOX. The gentleman does not understand me. I ask what was his argument in favor of creating the Census Bureau—whether when we created that Bureau it was not with the idea of vesting in it this authority to collect statistics for these other departments?
Mr. BURLESON. My object was then and is now to prevent the duplication of statistical work; and I assert emphatically that if the Census Bureau were to remain an independent bureau, and was not to be placed under the new department of commerce, I would not oppose this amendment. But if the Census Bureau is to be covered under the department of commerce we all know, as intelligent men, that the great commercial interests, the great manufacturing interests of this country will ultimately dominate that department, and that the interests of the agriculturists, in so far as the gathering of statistics is concerned, will suffer when placed under its control.
Where does the support of this suggestion come from, aside from the distinguished gentleman who offered the amendment and who advocates it ably and sincerely on the ground of economy? As I stated a moment ago, it comes from the cotton gamblers on the New York and New Orleans cotton exchanges. The Secretary of Agriculture made a most elaborate and conclusive argument against the disturbance of this statistical division, having in mind the very suggestion made by the gentleman from Nebraska. The Southern Cotton Growers' Protective Association, consisting of 600 delegates, met at Macon, Ga., less than ninety days ago and protested against the disturbance of the work as it is now being done by the Statistical Division of the Agricultural Department. Every farmer in this country is opposed to such a change, and if there is any interest behind this movement save that of the cotton gambler I do not know where it is to be found.

We must remember that cotton is the great staple crop of the United States, not even excepting wheat, and from the very minute the seed is put in the ground, and even before it is in the ground, the shrewdest men in the world are there representing the English spinners and the New England and Southern manufacturers, and are constantly engaged in making and publishing estimates of what the crop is going to be, the effect of which, of course, is felt in the price paid for our cotton.

We can not stop this practice, but at the same time we ought to have some means of offsetting the evil effect of it upon the producers by having an impartial tribunal, an impartial instrumentality, to make an estimate for the cotton producer, not that it is to be an inaccurate estimate, but to make known to him the real truth of the situation, if possible, in order that he may govern himself accordingly.

Gentlemen, I have been a producer of cotton for many years. I know something about it. I stand here to assert, and it will not be contradicted by any man who is in possession of the facts, that the Statistical Division of the Agricultural Department, while it is not claimed it has been mathematically exact in its estimates, it has saved the cotton producers of the South millions of dollars by giving to the producers of cotton what they think and believe, and what I believe, is an impartial estimate of what is to be the cotton crop of the United States for the current year.

It goes without saying, Mr. Chairman, that there ought not to be duplication in statistical work; but, as I have said, it depends altogether on what influences the Census Bureau is to fall under whether I would be willing to have it undertake the gathering of agricultural statistics.

For the present I oppose it, and hope the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I have before me a copy of the hearings containing the testimony of Mr. Merriam, the Director of the Census, in regard to this very matter. Of course, we all remember that the Director of the Census was anxious, as was natural, to enlarge the scope of his Bureau, to take in as large a jurisdiction as possible. Now we find that this bill appropriates for the division of statistics $141,160; and we find on pages 368–369 Mr. Merriam's testimony, his statement that it would cost him $450,000 a year to do the same work that the Secretary of Agriculture now does for $141,160.

Mr. BURKETT. He is not going to do it, is he?

Mr. GRAFF. Well, if the law——

Mr. BURKETT. This law does not say anything about that.

Mr. GRAFF. If the law withdraws from the Secretary of Agriculture the power to engage in any work——

Mr. BURKETT. But it does not.

Mr. GRAFF. Which the law confers power upon the Director of the Census to do, then I suppose the Director of the Census would consider it mandatory upon him to go on and enter upon this work.

Mr. BURKETT. This does not do anything of that sort. It simply says he shall not duplicate any work.

Mr. GRAFF. The gentleman does not say that his amendment will not have the power of transferring agricultural statistical work to the Census Bureau.

Mr. BURKETT. It could not possibly do it.

Mr. GRAFF. Now, the reason why there is such a vast difference between the cost under the Director of the Census and the Secretary of Agriculture is because the Secretary of Agriculture gets the greater portion of his information and reports from a quarter of a million men who do it as a labor of love, because they are enthusiastically, and also selfishly, for that matter, interested in the pursuit of agriculture, and it pleases them to be honored with being recognized as a crop reporter in their particular section of the country. It is the opinion of Secretary Wilson that these men who give their services free in making these reports upon crops render better service than the men who would be employed by the Director of the Census. He recompenses them by sending them a little special publication issued by the Agricultural Department, intended for them alone, besides seeds, agricultural reports, and other documents. If we pass this work into the control of the Director of the Census, then will follow a lot of little appointments with a salary of thirty or forty dollars a month, which will unavoidably be looked upon as political.

The kind of men who will receive these small appointments will be men who will seek them because of the little salary appended to them, and instead of having this cheap, voluntary, but good service rendered by the farmers of the country themselves taking part and being made to feel that they are indeed an important part of this agricultural work, we will have the paid labor with the less valuable service. The Secretary of Agriculture does not depend upon any one source of information, but he has five or six lines of inquiry, all of them independent and coming from different sources, and the man at the head of this statistical bureau does not see any of these reports until they have all been tabulated and are presented to him together.

By the experience of this Statistical Bureau over a period of several decades the head of the Statistical Bureau is enabled to know by experience about how much of value ought to be put upon information from a particular source, and the result is that the Secretary of Agriculture is armed, for that very reason, with better facilities for safely forecasting the amount of crops in any particular line of agricultural industry. The Secretary of Agriculture said, in his address before us, and he was very forceful about it and very much in earnest, that to take that Statistical Bureau away from the Department of Agriculture would absolutely be moving from it the very vitals of the Department.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Are not these unpaid and voluntary correspondents of the Agricultural Department generally the postmasters of the South, who are in the interests of the planter?

Mr. LAMB. Oh, no.

Mr. GRAFF. I do not know that that is true. I do not know whether it is true in the South, but I do know that the men who furnish the agricultural report from Illinois are not postmasters, but are men who follow the plow and are engaged in actual farming.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the purport of the amendment which has been offered to this bill, it is simply that the Statistical Division in the Agricultural Department shall not duplicate any work that is now done by the Census Bureau. The Census Bureau only does the work which the laws of Congress specifically make it its duty to do. The amendment will not confer a single iota of additional authority upon the Census Bureau, will not add a single function to that office, but it simply provides that what the Census Bureau does shall not be done at the same time and at governmental expense by the Statistical Bureau in the Agricultural Department. That is the scope and purpose of the amendment.

Mr. GRAFF. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. GRAFF. Is it the opinion of the gentleman from Indiana that the effect of this amendment will be to prohibit the Secretary of Agriculture from carrying on his Bureau of Statistics in agriculture?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not think it will.

Mr. GRAFF. Then, if that is true, and if the gentlemen who are supporting this amendment think so, will they formulate their amendment so that it will not reach agricultural statistics?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I yielded only for a question.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question again?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I beg to be excused. I want to answer the gentleman's colleague, and then I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. My judgment is that the two bureaus are not doing exactly the same kind of work, and the amendment will doubtless be construed by both bureaus so that they can both continue what they have been doing.

I want to say in relation to the crop statistics gotten out by the Agricultural Bureau for the year 1899 and the same statistics taken by the Census Bureau, by paid officers acting under oath for the same year, that there was a discrepancy between the two bureaus of about 600,000,000 bushels of corn, nearly 300,000,000 bushels of oats, 150,000,000 bushels of wheat, and 28,000,000 tons of hay for that one year. Such discrepancies between these two bureaus utterly destroy the value of the statistics of one or the other.

Mr. SHOWALTER. Which was nearest correct?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Which one of the bureaus was correct?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The presumption is that the officers who were paid and who were sworn faithfully to perform their duties did correct work, and I think that presumption is proper, in view of the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAFF] that the Agricultural Department statistics are largely a work of love. I submit that statistics of that character are absolutely worthless as a means of information to the country.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] has said that the presumption is that the Census Bureau was correct. Is not that rather a violent presumption, in view of the fact that according to the census report in more than one hundred counties of the United States the Bureau returned more agricultural land than the geographical area of the counties?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. No; that is not correct, because in that instance it was a labor of love. They visited abstractors and local officials and got gratuitous information, like the statistical information obtained by the Agricultural Department all along the line.

Mr. SCOTT. That was certainly a part of the regular census reports.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It was a part of the census reports, but the gentleman must understand that the special agents of the Census Bureau went to auditors' offices and various public offices to get the information from State officers in reference to the acreage and volume of land being farmed and that sort of thing under regulations from the Director of the Census.

Mr. SCOTT. My understanding was that the census enumerators were paid 15 cents a farm for returning this information, and that it was their reports that were so grossly inaccurate.

Mr. BARTLETT. I desire to ask the gentleman if it would not be unjust to a certain section of the country to put this amendment upon this bill with this view? The Census Bureau only begins to report the cotton crop by receiving the reports of the ginners, beginning with the 16th of October, and making three reports; that is, at the end of October, at the end of November, and at the end of December. If we provide in this bill that this shall not be duplicated by the Department, then the Department can not make any report whatever with reference to the cotton crop after the 15th day of October, and the cotton is all made by that time, generally.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I supposed I was yielding to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is true.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. In my judgment, the practical operation of this amendment will amount to nothing, as I said a moment ago. There will be no complete duplication in any line of investigation, in research, or in statistics, and both bureaus will continue to work just as they have been doing in the past.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, whether this statistical report by the one bureau or the other is the better one, or whether one should be transferred to the other or not, is one proposition; but this amendment in and of itself means nothing but confusion worse confounded. Now the Census Bureau reports partially the cotton crop, and not altogether. The Census Bureau reports partially the wheat, oats, and corn crops, but not in toto.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him right there, that statement is not quite true.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Well, it is partially true all the same.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Census Bureau does not do that by law.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I must have more time, if I am to be interrupted.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will not interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to lay down this proposition, and the gentleman can not deny it, that if this amendment is adopted there will be a struggle to determine what are the duties of the Census Bureau and what are the duties of the Department of Agriculture, and nobody can prevent that. Now, if the gentleman who proposed the amendment intends to mean anything, let him say that certain duties now performed by the Census Bureau shall not be performed by that Bureau, but shall be transferred to the Department of Agriculture, or vice versa. Then the two Bureaus will know exactly what they want, and this amendment will only increase confusion and accomplish nothing under the heavens, and the only purpose is to pull down one and build up another.

Now, in answer to the gentleman from Indiana, perhaps the best thing done yet was the discrepancy between these two reports. The world is struggling to know now what the facts are, and, while it was all laid to the door of one Bureau, nobody can tell what it was. It was all guesswork, because in the second Bureau and the second estimate there is a discrepancy. Let the two go on and within the next twelve months you will find out which one can make the better report, and then will be the time to act.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, we had very much the same matter which is in controversy here now before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in preparing the bill in relation to the new department of commerce and labor. I have not been able to find, Mr. Chairman, that there is at present any real duplication of statistics between the Agricultural Department and the Census Office. It is true that both divisions of statistics endeavor to arrive at the same result. It is also true that they pursue different plans. They both seek to furnish information in relation to agricultural products, particularly reports in reference to the cotton crop. But the Agricultural statistical bureau furnishes estimates of what the cotton crop is likely to be, or what it is ascertained or expected to be from estimates. The Census Office has never endeavored to make estimates of agricultural products. The Census Office endeavors to state facts. It is true the facts must necessarily be made upon estimates furnished by the producer, and hence the total result may be only estimates. But there is no reason that I can see why both divisions of the Government should not be permitted to obtain all the information that is possible and lay it before the people.

I was surprised, however, to hear the genial gentleman from Texas say that if this were transferred to the department of commerce and labor it would be dominated by commercial influences as against agricultural interests. I deny and repudiate the idea, and at the same time would deny that the bureau in the Department of Agriculture is dominated by influences adverse to commerce. The Department of Agriculture endeavors to furnish information, without regard to personal influences, which can be used by everybody. The same would be true if the endeavor were made by the department of commerce and labor. If the gentleman from Texas be right, the reports from the Department of Agriculture are valueless, because on his theory they are furnished only to influence the markets in the interest of the farmers and against the consumer. That would be an unfair proposition. It would be an unfair result. That is not true now.

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman permit me to correct him?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BURLESON. The accurate and unbiased crop estimate of the Statistical Division of the Agricultural Department tends to counteract the selfish estimates made by the representatives of the Fall River and Lancashire spinners.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas maintains the bias of the label of his partisan party. Gentlemen on the other side of the aisle always say to those on this side, "We are unbiased. It is you who are partisans." He now says that the Agricultural Department is nonpartisan and the department of commerce and labor would be partisan. I say that the Agricultural Department is not partisan—is not influenced in favor of the farmer as against commerce—and the department of commerce and labor would be equally nonpartisan and unbiased, notwithstanding the biased mind of the gentleman from Texas, who seems unable to appreciate that a department of the Government may be unbiased.

The present Department of Agriculture furnishes estimates of the cotton crop. It ought to furnish estimates of other products of the farm. The Census Office does not furnish estimates. It can not furnish estimates. It is the duty of the Census Office to gather figures and furnish facts. It ought never to be permitted to enter upon the domain of guesswork. The Department of Agriculture is properly engaged in the domain of guesswork. Everybody knows that they guess in a way, basing their opinions upon the best information they can obtain. We all know their estimates can not be considered as absolute truth, but we know their worth and take them for what they are worth. They are the best we can get and are worth far more than they cost.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska reads in this way:

Provided, That no part of this sum shall be used in duplicating work now directed by law to be done by the Census Bureau.

Now, the law upon which the Census Bureau acts is found in the ninth section, in which this language is used:

And that in addition to the statistics now provided for by law the Director of the Census shall annually collect the statistics of the cotton production of the country as returned by the ginners, and bulletins giving the results of the same shall be issued weekly beginning September 1 of each year and continued till February 1 following; and that the Director of the Census shall make, from time to time, any additional special collections of statistics relating to any branch of agriculture, manufacture, mining, transportation, fisheries, or any other branch of industry that may be required of him by Congress.

The duplication of work occurs in gathering the statistics from the cotton ginners. The Agricultural Department collects the statistics from the ginners and the Census Office is compelled to do that also by law. You compelled them to do it. That is all the duplication that takes place.

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman accept an amendment to the amendment, striking out the Census Bureau and inserting the Agricultural Department?

Mr. WADSWORTH. All I want is to avoid duplication.

Mr. BURLESON. The effect being that there shall be no duplicate work.

Mr. BURKETT. But this is not a census bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the gentleman think that would be sufficient to repeal the operation of section 9 of the Census Bureau law?

Mr. BURLESON. No; but the report is made under it. The Director of the Census informed your committee that it would cost $400,000 more——

Mr. WADSWORTH. The only duplication is in the statistics from the ginners.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. May I suggest an amendment?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That the Agricultural Department shall not attempt to take estimates of the cotton crop by the gins, as ordered in the Census Department.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am willing to accept any amendment that will prevent duplication.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I believe the object which we all desire will be reached if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska is changed so as to provide that no work shall be done by the Census Bureau—no agricultural statistical work shall be done by the Census Bureau—which is now required by law to be done by the Agricultural Department.

Mr. BURLESON. I do not understand whether the gentleman from Nebraska is willing to accept that.

Mr. BURKETT. You can not amend the census law in passing an Agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. We can amend the census law as well on this bill as any other.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman. I want to say that whenever the question of duplication of work is suggested in this House it has the same effect on some of the members around here as water would on a mad dog. When we had up the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, just before the holidays, I was told by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations—not only by the chairman, but by my colleague from Georgia—that there was a bill already pending somewhere that was going to prevent this duplication of statistics, and if we would let the matter go by it would be all arranged. Now we are told the same about the cotton statistics, and as soon as the gentleman from Nebraska proposes to stop it he is attacked from every direction.

I want to call your attention to the amendment in the bill authorizing the permanent Census Bureau, when the gentleman from Texas made a severe speech where he took occasion to criticize me and the gentleman from Nebraska when this bill was before the House establishing a permanent Census Bureau. He said:

> Now, one word in answer to a suggestion made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX], who is also a stickler for economy. He says he is opposed to this measure, or intimates that he is opposed to it, because it embodies a provision for the gathering of data in reference to the production of cotton. I am responsible, Mr. Chairman, for that provision in the bill. It is a fact well known to every producer of cotton that for years it has been contended that the price of this great staple has been depressed because of repeated statements made by stock manipulators that the cotton crop was largely in excess of what it really was.

Now, according to his own statement, the gentleman who attacks the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska is the author of this cotton provision in the permanent Census Bureau.

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman permit me a suggestion?

Mr. MADDOX. Yes; if it is only a suggestion.

Mr. BURLESON. I would still be willing for the Census Bureau to take the statistics if it was not to be covered under the department of commerce. Is the gentleman from Georgia willing that the Census Bureau should take them and be covered into the department of commerce?

Mr. MADDOX. I am not, and I stood here in opposition to establishing the bureau at that time for which there is no more need or use than a wagon has with five wheels. [Laughter.]

Now, some gentlemen make the suggestion that the Secretary of Agriculture shall not take his statistics from the ginners. I say to you to-day that there is no way in God Almighty's earth to get a real and genuine reliable report of the cotton crop of this country except from the ginners. Now, the Secretary of Agriculture was getting the statistics just as certain and reliable as any census bureau could. Why is it that you want the statistics duplicated? What is the use of it? Take what my colleague says; that it is the very thing to do. If it is an important thing to duplicate the census of the cotton crop, why is it not important to duplicate that of corn and wheat; and why should not you duplicate Congress? I say the duplication of this work—to be done twice and thrice, as it is in many instances—ought to be stopped. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is a very bad idea to have a duplication in connection with these reports. I think that the fact that these two governmental authorities have made a report so divergent has opened the eyes of the people to the value of the Agricultural Department's report as far as that is concerned. It is more accurately correct than the other. The difference between the two is most nearly true. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] called attention to the discrepancy between the two sets of reports. I want to call his attention to the fact that the Bureau of the Census in every case exceeded the figures given by the Department of Agriculture, and that the men of whom he speaks in the highest terms as "paid authorities" were paid by the quantity of products and the number of acres of land they reported.

I want to call his attention to the fact that the Director of the Census himself said, in a report before the Committee on Agriculture, that this caused a great deal of discussion. "They thought that the areas were too large; that there was too great an amount of farm land." "They claimed that in 102 counties there is too much farming land as shown by the enumerator as compared with the divisions made by the geographer." Now, I do not think it is a bad idea to have a duplication of returns in connection with crops where they rest to any extent upon estimates.

I want to say, further, that whether this amendment shall be adopted or not is one question; whether it shall be adopted now, when we have not time to find out its real bearing and its real meaning, is another question. It may be possible that after cool consideration in a committee I might be willing to adopt the amendment, or something like it. I might possibly be willing to say that one of these two departments should not make a January report, or a report as gathered from the gins. But I am not willing now to let a great question like this go off upon an amendment offered hotfooted in the course of the debate before the House, when none of us are competent to say, without further investigation of all the law of the Census Bureau and all the law of the Agricultural Department and without a careful comparison of the two, what the consequence would be.

A great deal has been said about the bias of people in making reports. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] denies in a hot-blooded way that anybody would have a bias. I join with him in denying that anybody would have a conscious bias, but as certainly as human nature is human nature, when a lot of cotton buyers begin to estimate a crop they estimate it always somewhat too high, because they are interested upon the side of buying cotton cheap and are interested in estimating a large crop, because then the price would be low. And it is also true, and everybody knows it, that when the farmers of the country go, as they yearly do, like lambs to be fleeced, into the "future" market, they nearly always figure on a low crop of cotton and a high price. Not because either side is dishonest, but because men are naturally influenced unconsciously by their environment and by their interest. So that there is some truth in a part of what the gentleman from Texas says.

I do not agree with him, however, in thinking (if he meant that) that the department of commerce would consciously "doctor" the returns to help the purchasers of cotton.

Mr. BURLESON. I did not say that.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Nor do I assume that you meant that. Nor do I believe for a minute that the Department of Agriculture would do the other thing. I have this to say for the Department of Agriculture, that its returns have been fair, have been nearer the truth than any other estimates. I have this to say for it, that it can do the work of collecting these gin returns as well as it can do the balance of the work, and at one-tenth of the expense at which it is being done by the other bureau.

Mr. LOVERING. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes; I yield for a question.

Mr. LOVERING. Is there any particular reason why the prognostications or predictions of this statistician would be more in favor of the farmers than of the spinners who buy and use the cotton?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Not a particle, nor are they. The statisticians make an allowance for these reports. As they come in, these reports are not taken just as they come and averaged. The work is not done in that way. For example, you report in a certain community, and the statistician finds from past history that you as a reporter there are apt to report a little too high. He discounts you. The Agricultural Department does not get its reports from the farmers alone.

[Here the hammer fell].

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. If it did, it might very probably be that the unconscious bias of the farmer would give the report of the crop too small, to short, but the Agricultural Department has as its reporters, not farmers alone, but bankers, lawyers, who are well acquainted in the community, merchants who buy cotton, factors who take it to sell to others, brokers who buy it on commission for the Fall River people and the English people, and country merchants and all sorts and conditions of people.

Mr. LOVERING. Is it not a fact that those who gather these reports gather them absolutely and avowedly in the interests of the farmer?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It is not a fact. That statement is untrue. On the contrary, some of the most trusted reporters of the Agricultural Department are cotton buyers and factors and merchants who buy cotton and do not sell it.

Mr. LOVERING. It came out in the hearings before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee that these men did make their statistics solely with reference to protecting the interests of the farmer. The inference was that the spinner——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Oh, that was a mere "obiter dictum in the way of an insinuation" by somebody. There was no evidence of that sort, I take it.

Mr. LOVERING. It was made by the Statistician of the Agricultural Department.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. He just remarked that "the farmers seemed to be satisfied."

Mr. LOVERING. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Or something of that sort.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. Chairman, I know we are somewhat impatient to vote on this matter. I thought I had the floor a few moments ago, but found that I was talking in somebody else's time instead of my own. Since offering this amendment, from one place or another all sorts of motives have been suggested for the amendment, and my genial friend from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] always sees ghosts when he gets up to talk on any matter. He imagines that there is somebody in London, I believe, behind this little amendment. I had not thought of the amendment probably fifteen minutes before I offered it; in fact, I had not had opportunity to look over the bill, and no one had suggested it to me. What prompted me to introduce it at this time was the occurrence which was had here on the floor a year ago.

I remember when the question of the permanent Census Bureau was up I took the position that, as it was then suggested, we did not have any use for it. I went further than some members and took the position that we should create something for the Census Bureau to do before we organized the Census Bureau. Others said, and I remember my friend from Texas [Mr. BURLESON], who speaks to-day against this proposition, in speaking then in support of the permanent Census Bureau, said: "Let us create the machinery and then we will give the machinery something to do." In reply I said, although I have not the RECORD here with me, something to this effect, that when the time should come to pass any work from any of these bureaus into the Census Bureau there would be such objection from the force that was then doing the work that you never could get work from any Department changed over into this new Census Department. I made up my mind then and there that on every opportunity where it should be done, in my judgment, if some gentleman who could do it better than I could did not undertake it, I would make such amendments or such additions to the law as would throw into the statistical bureau we have created the legitimate statistical work of the Government.

Now, I took particular pains with that amendment, and before I sent it up I drew over a dozen copies, and changed it and altered it so as to be particular not in any way to affect the work that should be done in the Agricultural Department. I said a year ago, as I say now, that there is work that the Agricultural Department ought to do that the Census Department can not do and should not undertake, and as I said to-day, I drew that little amendment over and over and finally got it into the fewest words and the simplest form possible, to say only that they should not duplicate anything required by law to de done by the Census Department. Now, when I drew that I had not looked over the law creating the Census Bureau. I did not remember, and probably no member does, just what we provided that the Census Bureau should do in reference to agricultural statistics. But, as it has been analyzed, there is only one thing other than what Congress shall specifically refer to the Census Bureau.

Now, we are not in any danger. We are just simply saying to that bureau over there, "Do your legitimate work." Here is a man at the head of a statistical bureau in the Agricultural Department who has collected about himself a force of 36 employees costing $46,000 a year. That is considerable for one statistical bureau in one single Department of this Government. Would it not be better to put a limitation upon that thing and say to the chief of this statistical bureau, "You must not do anything that we have provided by law shall be done down here in the regular statistical bureau of the Government. We are not taking away any of your statistical functions, for the Census Department does not deal with that." But there is one thing that is certainly apparent. Here we have provided what the Census Bureau shall do. Let us prohibit this matter of duplication. In short, we have come right now to the very place that some of us feared we would when we created this Census Bureau. We have created the machinery, and the very first time we undertake to give them anything to do somebody stands up and says, "You are taking work away from somebody or some department."

Now, there was no motive such as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] suggests, or such as was suggested by my committee colleague from Georgia, who spoke afterwards. My idea was simply to carry out the notion that we expressed here a year or two ago, that the statistical work of this Government should be collected under one head and at one place.

Now, they talk about what the farmers want and what the people of this country want. You could not pick up a newspaper that contained an editorial upon this question at the time the matter went through Congress that did not deplore the fact that we were printing and binding and scattering out through this country thousands and thousands of reports and volumes of statistics that were so numerous as to be absolutely worthless. The editorials in favor of a bill of that kind in the press of this country expressed the hope that we might collect the statistical work of the Government under one head, from which it might emanate with an authority for which the people of the country would have respect and in which they would have confidence. We have created that Bureau. Let us go not only to the Agricultural Department, but to every department of this Government, and say to them if we can not cut off what they are already doing, that they must not go any farther and must not do that which is provided by law to be done somewhere else.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] admits that his amendment was thought of some fifteen minutes before he began his speech. This bill is the result of the serious labor of the committee, running over a considerable time, and I can not think an amendment of this sort, offered on the spur of the moment, is entitled to much consideration from this committee. I take it for granted that the purpose of gathering statistics with reference to these crops is to approach accuracy. Absolute accuracy is impossible, of course, but it is a function of the Department of Agriculture which has been exercised for a great many years to take note of the planting of cotton, the growing of cotton, and the harvesting of cotton, from the time that the first fields are broken up in the spring until the last bale has been ginned and marketed.

They begin by making a count, not an estimate, but a count, as nearly as it can be made, of the number of acres that are put into cultivation, inquiring of the farmer how many acres he had the year before, and then by deducting if it is less and adding if it is more, arriving at a conclusion as to the number of acres planted. Then they report month by month while the cotton is growing and maturing the condition of that crop in comparison with the crop of the previous year. Of course that is an opinion. No man can state with accuracy that his crop is 10 per cent or 12 per cent better than last year or 10 or 12 per cent worse. He can only give an opinion; but these people in the Department of Agriculture are familiar with every feature in the cultivation of cotton. They have the statisticians, they have the employees already in the Department, and can go on, rounding out the year, taking all the statistics in connection with that crop, and unquestionably, in my judgment, can make a more accurate report than the Census Bureau can.

Further, Mr. Chairman, this Bureau has, in my judgment, the best plan of arriving at the number of bales of cotton, which is by counting them at the gin; or at least a better plan than that which has heretofore been pursued by the other Department, although it is now exercised by them also. It develops that the Bureau of Statistics has only been able to find about 25,000 of cotton gins in this country.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Thirty thousand.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Thirty thousand, whereas the Department of Agriculture has found twice as many. I submit, sir, that the figures of any bureau which will miss by 50 per cent the number of cotton gins in this country can not be relied on as being even approximately accurate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the gentleman explain how to account for the small difference on the total crop when one discovers there are twice the number of gins the other does?

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman from Georgia suggests to me that one gives the gins that are in operation and the other gives all the gins. How that is I do not know. How do they arrive at about the same estimate of the number of bales? Why, just as the gentlemen who are interested in marketing the cotton arrive at it—by sending out hundreds and thousands of letters of inquiry and getting reports, by allowing for the tendency of the people of the South, who produce the cotton, to minimize the possible yield, and by allowing, on the other hand, for the probable exaggeration of those interested in having reports of a big crop to go abroad—the statistician makes an estimate from the news he has received. I have known an estimate to be made within thirty or forty thousand bales by gentlemen who based their views upon these reports obtained in just that way.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon the paragraph and amendment be closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves that debate on the paragraph and amendment be closed. Without objection, that order will be made. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 11, on page 41, insert the following:

"Provided, That no part of this sum shall be used in duplicating work now directed by law to be done by the Census Bureau."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. BURKETT. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 31, noes 56.

So the amendment was rejected.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Irrigation investigations: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and report upon the laws as affecting irrigation and the rights of riparian proprietors and institutions relating to irrigation and upon the use of irrigation waters, at home or abroad, with especial suggestions of better methods for the utilization of irrigation waters in agriculture and those in common use, and upon plans for the removal of seepage and surplus waters by drainage, and upon the use of different kinds of power for irrigation and other agricultural purposes, and for the preparation, printing, and illustration of reports and bulletins on irrigation, including employment of labor in the city of Washington or elsewhere; and the agricultural experiment stations are hereby authorized and directed to cooperate with the Secretary of Agriculture in carrying out said investigations in such manner and to such extent as may be warranted by a due regard to the varying conditions and needs of the respective States and Territories as may be mutually agreed upon, and all necessary expenses, $25,000.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out, on page 49, lines 5 and 6, the word "twenty-five" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "fifty-five."

Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the Committee on Agriculture on the extreme conservatism and regard for economy which has characterized its consideration of this measure. While the country is growing at the rate of 2,000,000 inhabitants per annum, and its agricultural areas increase hundreds of thousands of acres every year, while agricultural interests are increasing in every direction, the committee has concluded that in practically every item of expenditure by the Department the amount that is carried by the bill for the current year is exactly and precisely what will be required for the coming fiscal year. It may seem strange that this should be so, but the committee has said it, and I suppose we should respect their judgment.

The committee find, however, that there was one item which, in their opinion, was last year altogether too high. It is the only reduction of any moment in the bill, so far as I have been able to discover. While there is a reduction of $10,000 in another item, that reduction is provided for by an increase of $20,000 in an item carried in another part of the bill. The only reduction that they have made is in the expense of irrigation investigations, which they have reduced from $65,000 to $25,000; and their reasons for so doing were certainly unique and at the same time highly complimentary to the Bureau of Irrigation Investigations. They say that they have reduced the sum from $65,000 to $25,000, not because the work is not necessary, pressing, and desirable, not because the work has not been well carried on, not because the results are not satisfactory, but because the Bureau has conducted its work in so satisfactory a manner that a large appropriation is no longer required. Their statement is as follows:

Upon full and careful consideration, your committee reached the conclusion that the appropriation heretofore made for this specific purpose might be reduced without detriment to the public interest, and has therefore recommended the sum of $25,000 for the ensuing year.

In recommending this reduction the committee does not wish to be understood as questioning the value of the work that has heretofore been done by the Department along these lines. On the contrary, the committee is of the opinion that this work has been so thoroughly and well done as to render unnecessary a continuation of the large appropriation heretofore made for its prosecution.

The view of your committee is that the full duty of the Federal Government will be performed if it maintains a small staff of trained experts on irrigation, who shall keep abreast of all the developments relating to this subject, compile and publish from time to time such information as they may acquire and the interests of the people may demand, and offer suggestions and advice in response to individual requests. It would seem that $25,000 annually should be ample for this purpose, and that amount is accordingly recommended.

I wonder if there is another bureau in the Agricultural Department in regard to which the committee could say so much, on whose work the committee could place so high a commendation.

Mr. Chairman, I am confident that the fact that there is no gentleman on the Committee on Agriculture who lives in the arid or semiarid region had no bearing whatever on the fact that this is the only item in the bill reduced.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT] comes from a semiarid region.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman says the gentleman from Kansas comes from a semiarid region. I think the gentleman would hardly admit that himself, because I believe he claims to come from the great corn and wheat belt of Kansas. I doubt if he has any irrigation in his district. However, if the gentleman is right about that, there is no gentleman on the committee from the distinctively arid regions; but, as I said before, I would not suggest that that fact had any bearing on this question, because I am satisfied the gentlemen would not reduce an appropriation because it does not help their constituents.

But, on the other hand, I believe that the fact that the gentlemen on the committee do not come from the arid regions, and therefore have not been called upon to give attention to the question of irrigation, has necessarily resulted in a lack of that information and knowledge of the subject which is necessary in order to express the best judgment upon it. You must remember that we inherit as a people, as viewed from an irrigation standpoint, a very extraordinary rule for the use of water, that rule under which the bucolic owner of a few rods of reed-bordered shore along the lower courses of some great river system largely controls its destiny from its birth amid the snow-clad mountains, in its meanderings through rich and fertile agricultural regions, past mighty cities, to where it flings itself into the bosom of the briny deep. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have time to conclude his remarks.

Mr. MONDELL. Great cities may be built upon the banks of such a great artery of trade and commerce. Millions of people may dwell upon its banks, and large interests may be dependent upon its waters to turn the wheels of industry and give fertility to parched and arid lands, but the riparian owner of a few acres near its mouth, under the old common law of riparian rights, may from his reed-built hut cast his dreaming eyes out over its idly flowing flood and insist that no man, or set of men, no matter how vast their interests may be, upstream shall diminish its quantity or affect its quality. This law, even in the humid region, has restricted development and laid a blackmail upon industry. In a country dependent upon irrigation, it is absolutely fatal.

We inherited this law and this rule and, with true Anglo-Saxon assurance that our laws and our customs were heaven born and better than those of others, placed them in the constitutions of some of our States even in the arid region. After a beginning had been made in the development of irrigation we attempted to modify by court decision the evils of the law of riparian rights and riparian ownership, and fortunately those of our Western States last admitted into the Union were wise enough to adopt the rule of public control of water. Now the highest development of our irrigation resources demands that our water laws and usages shall in the essentials be as uniform as practicable and, founded on right principles. To bring about this much-needed reform we need full and trustworthy information on all these matters and this information the division of irrigation investigations has been securing and compiling.

Now, we are irrigating in the United States a greater area than any country save India alone. We will, in days to come, irrigate an area at least as large as that irrigated in all the balance of the world. The question of irrigation affects the destinies of the dwellers in over one-third of the continental territory of these United States. Seven and one-half millions are now under irrigation, at least sixty or seventy millions will be brought under irrigation in the future, and the area is increasing about 400,000 acres annually.

For the purpose of investigating the questions connected with and relating to the practice in agriculture of irrigation we have for the past two years made an appropriation of $65,000. This appropriation was for the purpose of investigating the water laws and usages and customs of all of the arid and semiarid States; to study the effects of these laws, rules, regulations, and usages; to study the questions of the application of water to the soil and its effect when applied in varying quantities; to study the possibilities of irrigation not only in the arid and semiarid region of the country, but in the humid regions of the country as well. Investigations have been carried on in New Jersey, in Missouri, in Louisiana, in Texas, and are now being carried on in connection with the culture of rice in the Carolinas.

The committee pays a high tribute to this division, and the work it has accomplished with its small appropriation, in their report, while they cut down the appropriation by nearly two-thirds. The men who constitute the working force of this division are among the best irrigation engineers and experts in these United States. And yet the salaries paid in this division are less by 35 to 50 per cent than the salaries paid to men whose duties are purely administrative in several of the other bureaus of the Agricultural Department.

The committee has suggested in their report that the work has been carried on so thoroughly and so much has been accomplished, that all that will be necessary for the future will be to maintain a few experts for the purpose of answering questions.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. HAUGEN. If the employees of this Department are being imposed upon why not cut off the appropriation entirely?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that question does the gentleman justice, and it certainly does not do him credit. I think that the gentleman would hardly make that suggestion in regard to any appropriation carried in a bill in which he is interested. I was simply calling the attention of the House to these facts, inasmuch as it had been suggested that a considerable portion of this appropriation was being paid for salaries in order to show that the salaries in this division are lower on an average than in other divisions of the Agricultural Department.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as regards the work that has been done, and the work which must be done in the future; under this appropriation the division has studied carefully the water problems of California, and has issued a bulletin, known as "Bulletin 100," which is a classic on the subject. It has issued another bulletin, entitled "Use of Water in Irrigation," which is the best publication of that kind that ever went to press. It has investigated carefully water usages in Utah, and now has in press a volume similar to that published on water use in California relative to Utah. In order to show the number and character of the publications of this division, I shall print with my remarks a list of the same. They constitute a most notable and valuable collection of irrigation works, all of value and several of unusual merit and importance.

This is a study of the water laws of Colorado as illustrated by the irrigation from Big Thompson River. Mr. Field discusses more particularly the "water-loaning" law, a recent enactment which has a tendency to unsettle all existing rights to Colorado streams.

This is the third of the annual reports of the irrigation investigations of this Office. Explains the agricultural conditions prevailing and the methods of acquiring and using water for irrigation practiced in that portion of the arid region covered more particularly by the States of Colorado, Wyoming, Utah, Idaho, and Montana, in which the conditions and methods are somewhat similar.

The division now proposes to undertake the investigation of the questions of water use, water laws, and water rights on the Platte River as affecting appropriation and use in the States of Colorado and Kansas. It is well known that there is now a suit in the Supreme Court of the United States between those two States relative to their respective rights to the waters of the Platte River. It is of the greatest importance that some bureau or department of the Government shall collect and publish the facts as regards the use and the appropriation of water along that stream. The appropriation of $25,000 here proposed will not enable the Department to undertake that work.

The Government, it will be remembered, has become a party to this suit between the United States and Colorado, in view of the fact that the interests of the Federal Government in this question are greater than the interests of either the State of Kansas or the State of Colorado. And let it be remembered——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I trust the gentleman will recognize that if we are to have the general irrigation proposition discussed there ought to be arranged some equal division of time.

Mr. MONDELL. I will say to the gentleman that I will try not to impose on the House on this subject. I attempted to discuss the subject before the committee, but I did not get the opportunity to do so. I asked time this morning under general debate to discuss the subject.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Can the gentleman give us some idea as to how long he expects to speak, so that some arrangement can be made as to a fair division of the time?

Mr. MONDELL. Possibly ten minutes.

Let it be remembered that the Government of the United States is the owner of 535,000,000 acres of land in the arid and semiarid regions of the United States; that the Government itself has a greater interest in the question of irrigation, as a landowner, than anybody and everybody else; that, in addition, the Government has imposed upon it a duty of assisting in safeguarding the rights of all the people in the use of the water in the arid region.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But if the arid land is sold, and the proceeds are to go into the hands of the Government, what is to be done with those proceeds?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, the gentleman has a pretty good idea what is to become of the proceeds. Against his very earnest protest, those proceeds are to be used for the purpose of making homes for people in the arid regions.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then what interest has the Government in improving the value of that land?

Mr. MONDELL. As the gentleman will recollect, the irrigation bill provides for reimbursement to the Government of all its expenditures made under that bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Does the gentleman believe that there will ever be one dollar of reimbursement?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I do not feel called upon to answer that question. I take it, as the majority of the House voted for the bill, a majority of the House took it for granted that the bill was passed in good faith. Certainly I for one voted for it in good faith. But this is not a question of the irrigation bill. This is a question of the subject of irrigation as related to agriculture and the agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The gentleman does not contend that the proposed amendment, which increases the appropriation over that recommended by the committee, would in any sense, under the irrigation bill passed at the last session, be reimbursed to the United States Government?

Mr. MONDELL. No, sir; this is an appropriation made in the interests of agriculture under the methods of irrigation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Out of the general Treasury.

Mr. MONDELL. As all the other appropriations for the benefit of the constituents of the gentleman from Indiana under this bill are also from the general Treasury—no more so, certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But I understood the gentleman to say that there would be reimbursement under the irrigation bill. That would not apply to any proposed appropriation under this bill.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] was discussing the question of the irrigation bill which we passed at the last session.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Yes, sir.

Mr. MONDELL. And I reminded him that the disbursement of the Government under that bill would be reimbursed.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But the irrigation bill passed at the last session of Congress, which the gentleman so ably championed, applied, as I understand, to public lands belonging equally to all the people. Now the gentleman by his amendment, as I understand, would provide for a larger appropriation out of the General Treasury.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, Mr. Chairman, it is not true—though that would have nothing to do with the matter under discussion—it is not true that the people of the arid States received a grant of the public lands in those States. It is true that the people of the United States—the people who shall have the courage to go to the far West and contend with the difficulties there, to undertake the work of irrigation, have, by the legislation of the last session, been given an enlarged opportunity to do so. The men who will be benefited by that bill will be the constituents of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], in much larger proportion than the constituents of any of the members from the arid States, for our people already have their little homes and holdings, and the increase in the irrigated areas of the West must be made by men coming from the States east of us.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is utterly impossible for the division of irrigation investigation to carry on the work that it is absolutely necessary in the interests of the people and of the Government should be carried on under this appropriation of $25,000. The committee does not seem to understand at all the purpose of the establishment of the division or the work it was intended to accomplish when they say that $25,000 will be sufficient to maintain a small corps of experts for the purpose of answering questions relative to irrigation.

They have actually appropriated as much money for the purpose of discovering an improved method of making sirup as they have for the purpose of inquiring into and providing for the agricultural needs of the people of one-half of these United States. They are proposing to make inquiries relative to the growth of tea in one or two small sections of the country, and for that purpose appropriate nearly half as much as the entire appropriation they make to investigate the questions of water laws and water rights and water usages throughout half the Union.

Understand, gentlemen, that we have here a problem such as no other people ever had. The Anglo-Saxon inherited the law of riparian rights. No other people ever undertook irrigation development under such a handicap, for the law of all the balance of the wide world, except the British Isles, is the law of appropriation and public control; and after all these years we must amend much that has been done, we must remodel laws now on the statute books, we must improve practices of the past, and we can only do this intelligently after a careful, thorough investigation of present conditions.

Now, $65,000 is the amount carried in the bill last year. Seventy-five thousand dollars was the amount asked by the Secretary. There is no good reason why this item, affecting a region not represented by the members of the committee, should be reduced by two-thirds when other items of the bill remain practically as they were last year, and in view of the further fact and admission made by the members of the committee that the work done under this appropriation in the past has been in every respect praiseworthy. I shall not at this late hour trespass upon the time of the House further, but shall print as part of my remarks a brief statement of the scope and work of the division of irrigation investigations and also a summary of the work of the past year prepared in the division.

The irrigation of the arid region is a problem of water as well as land, and of the two water is most important, because there is an abundance of land, but only a limited water supply. The economy with which water is used will have much to do, therefore, with the acres irrigated; and the wisdom of the laws governing its ownership will have everything to do with the value of farm lands and the success of the men who cultivate them. All the water laws of the arid States have been passed by the States themselves, and all the water rights thus far acquired have been established either under State laws or through court decisions.

Under these laws claims have been established to more water than the streams furnish, and in many instances the courts have decreed more water than is now used or can ever be furnished. In some of the States, water is by law made personal property, and streams are bought and sold just as coal or corn or any other personal property. It needs no argument to show that these conditions must have a vital effect on future development, and the importance to the whole country of having an accurate knowledge of existing conditions. Congress needs to know this as well as farmers, because of its relation to the success of the national irrigation act passed at the last session of Congress.

One of the objects for which this investigation was begun was to determine the character of existing rights to water as established under State laws and the conditions created by these rights. The first State investigated was California, and Bulletin 100 contains one of the most exhaustive showings of irrigation conditions which has ever been published in this or any other country. A similar investigation has been completed in Utah, and the report on this State is ready for publication. A similar report on water rights in Nevada has been carried on for two years and will be completed during the present summer. These investigations have been partially completed in Montana, Washington, and Colorado, and it is expected that, under the present rate of progress, all of these investigations will be completed and the reports published, or ready for publication, within the next two or three years.

When it has once been done, Congress and the several States will have a knowledge of existing conditions and be in possession of facts which must be had in order to determine the kind of water legislation which should be enacted by the Federal and State governments. Sooner or later the nature of these rights must be ascertained. If this work is curtailed now it will have to be taken up at some subsequent time, and delay will only result in increased expense and added complication. The value of these studies of irrigation laws was referred to by President Roosevelt in his message two years ago. He recommended that they not only be carried on in this country, but that we avail ourselves of the experience of other countries by making a study of their laws and institutions.

Another question which needs to be settled in the West is the method to be employed in the division of water from interstate streams. Many Western rivers are used by irrigators in two or three States. Some of them rise in States where riparian rights have been abrogated and flow into States where riparian rights are recognized. There must be some adjustment of these conflicting doctrines in order that development, whether by the Government or by private parties, can be made without danger of complications and ultimate loss.

The last Congress required the Secretary of Agriculture to report on the rights of riparian proprietors. Under this a study of interstate questions has been taken up. When it has been completed it will practically embrace the water-right situation in Colorado, Wyoming, and Nebraska. To drop this work now means to extend the uncertainty, apprehension, and anxiety that now exists and which is likely to give rise to harassing and long-continued litigation. (Exhibits showing the interest in this matter: See Water and Forest, pp. 2 and 4; copy of two Montana papers, Bozeman Chronicle, marked article on p. 4, and Rocky Mountain Husbandman, marked article on p. 2.)

PRACTICAL STUDIES OF THIS INVESTIGATION.

The other line of work of this investigation is a study of the practical questions which confront farmers and the answering of inquiries which are received by the Department. These investigations have taken up measurement of the amount of water used in irrigating an acre of land in different parts of the country, in order to determine the requirements of different soils and different crops. This information is needed by courts in determining the amount of water rights; it is needed by ditch companies and farmers in making water-right contracts; it is of great importance to the whole country, because the ultimate acreage which will be watered will depend on the skill and economy with which canals are managed and water applied to crops.

The need of these investigations and of information of this kind is especially great in this country, because the whole subject is strange and new. Nearly all of the present generation of irrigators have gone West from the East and have had to learn how to use water, and at the present time this emigration is greater than ever before. More men will probably attempt to irrigate next spring for the first time than ever before in the history of the country. Nothing can be more wasteful than to have each one of these learn experimentally for himself what has already been found out elsewhere.

The bulletins furnished by this investigation, showing the amount of water used, the extent of losses in canals, the different methods of applying water, are being sought for from all over the country, East as well as West. Farmers who expect to irrigate and those who are already irrigators have equal need of this information. It has already exerted a marked influence in promoting economy in the use of water and increasing the yield of crops. The need of continuing these studies and furnishing this information is greater at present than ever before. The demand for these publications during the past year made it necessary that second editions of some of the bulletins be published, the outlay for printing alone being about $10,000.

This work is not confined, however, to the arid region. Farmers are beginning to irrigate in the East as well as the West, and the Department of Agriculture receives a large number of letters from farmers asking the amount of water required for irrigation, the cost of pumping, the kind of pumps needed, the crops best suited to irrigation—all questions which need to be answered by men of training and experience and who are in close touch with all of the progress made in this subject. The important benefits which have come from the information furnished the rice growers of the Atlantic and Gulf coasts and the market gardeners and farmers throughout the South and Middle West would alone justify the entire appropriation asked for by the Secretary. To cut this off, or to give an insufficient amount, means simply that many of these inquiries can not be answered and that the work of the Department will be greatly hampered.

[Extract from report of Dr. A. C. True.]

IRRIGATION INVESTIGATIONS.

During the past year the irrigation investigations of this office embraced the following lines of work:

1. Measurements of the volume of water used and studies of the most efficient methods of applying water to crops in all of the arid States but one. Similar measurements in the rice district of Louisiana and Texas and in four of the humid States of the Mississippi Valley and Atlantic seaboard.

2. Measurements of the losses of water from canals by seepage, and studies of the best means of preventing the destructive rise of the water coming from these canals in the cultivated lands below. These measurements have shown that drainage has a greater importance than has hitherto been realized, and that irrigation in all of the large cultivated districts must be supplemented by drainage. In sections where frost has not to be contended with canals can be cemented and these losses prevented in this way, but in the greater part of the arid region the water which wastes from the canals must either be intercepted by deep drainage ditches and carried away to points where it can be applied to arid areas, or returned to the stream by means of a system of open or tile drains. Studies of the drainage problems were carried on in Colorado, California, and a beginning made in Washington.

3. The studies of the legal and economic questions connected with the appropriation of streams by irrigators were continued by studies of the water-right situation on Carson and Walker rivers in Nevada, Sevier and Virgin rivers in Utah, and the Gallatin River in Montana, and a study of the interstate water-right questions on the Platte River, embracing the rights of appropriators and riparian proprietors, has been begun. The need of some final and definite settlement of the nature of water ownership which shall be recognized and some simple and effective means of establishing the rights of existing users is becoming every year more urgent. Until this has been settled there can be no safe or enduring foundation for future development.

4. The past year has witnessed a considerable extension of irrigation in the humid portions of the United States, and tends to confirm the belief heretofore expressed that this aid to agriculture is destined to have a large field of usefulness in the East as well as in the West. The rapid growth of rice irrigation along the Gulf Coast has been continued, and it has been supplemented in other parts of the South by the installation of pumping machinery for the irrigation of market gardens, and, in some instances, of comparatively large areas of field crops. All of the reports thus far received from these experimental efforts in the South have shown that it was profitable. In the northern and eastern part of the United States the results for the past season were not so conclusive, because of the exceptionally large rainfall of last summer, but reports from Wisconsin and New Jersey are to the effect that even in this season of ample rainfall the lands which were irrigated showed an increase over the unirrigated areas.

The results of the irrigation investigations of this office may be summarized as follows:

1. The measurements of water used in irrigation have shown:

(a) That the losses from canals by seepage are much greater than have generally been supposed, amounting in some instances to one-half of the volume diverted.

(b) This escaping water lessens the effective service of the stream, saturates large areas, rendering them unfit for cultivation through excess of water, excess of alkali, or both.

(c) The average volume of water used in irrigating an acre of land under present practice is greater than has been assumed by the majority of writers on the subject, and less than has been granted in many adjudications of water rights.

(d) The determination of an approximate standard for the duty of water in every important irrigation district is as necessary to the just establishment of titles to water, or the effective division of streams among users, as the establishment of a unit of value in trade or exchange.

(e) The need of increased knowledge of the duty of water has been made more urgent by the passage of the national irrigation act, under which the area of land which a given water supply will irrigate has to be determined in advance of its actual use in apportioning the cost of the work and determining whether these projects may be made to pay.

(f) To provide for the distribution of water among a multitude of users and lay the foundation for future development, these studies of the duty of water should be continued until the approximate volume required in each district where they are made has been ascertained; they should be extended to other important irrigated districts of the arid region until all the varying conditions of soil, climate, and crop have been dealt with.

2. The conservation of the water supply and the area of land which it will irrigate will be largely determined by the economy and skill with which it is used by irrigators. These investigations have shown that much can be done by lessening the loss from seepage in canals, by draining the areas which have been rendered unfit for cultivation by the rise of seepage waters and applying the water carried off by these drains in the reclamation of lands now arid. The improvement of canals and the preparation of plans for the drainage of irrigated areas involves new and complex engineering questions which require expert study in their solution. The demand for information with respect to these matters and the important results already secured leads to the belief that the studies of the problems of soil water connected with seepage and drainage are among the most important questions committed to this investigation.

3. The studies of the legal and economic problems of irrigation have shown:

(a) That under the lax and imperfect irrigation laws of some of the Western States great uncertainty exists with respect to titles to water, and litigation and controversy have resulted, which have been an obstacle to development and exceedingly expensive and annoying to water users.

(b) Under these laws claims to water have been recorded which amount in the aggregate to many times the volume now in use, and on some streams to far more than the total supply. Owing to lack of information of the actual volume of water required to irrigate an acre of land, many rights have been decreed in excess of actual necessities. The question therefore arises, Are the present rights to water limited to the actual present uses, or do these excessive decrees constitute a valid title to the stream? In some cases their holders have sought to put them to profitable use by selling the surplus. Doing this makes of the water of a stream a private, speculative property.

(c) The larger use of water for cities and towns, for manufacturing, the increasing area of land being brought under irrigation, and the larger number of people depending on streams for the value of their homes and the return for their labors, render it indispensable that some simple, conclusive method of establishing titles to water for all purposes should be established, and that the rights so established should be protected in times of scarcity. The vital importance of this question to the whole country, and the need of guarding against selfishness and greed acquiring unjust rights to this important resource, renders it indispensable that streams should be placed under public control and that no less authority than the public should determine the actual needs of users and supervise the establishment of their rights.

(d) The respective spheres of State and national authority over both State and interstate water supplies should be more clearly defined than they are at present in order that effective legislation for the establishment of titles and protection of rights may be had.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to oppose this appropriation, either through the medium of the report of the committee or the amendment proposed thereto. I want to point out merely how rapidly the suggestions which I had the honor to make a year ago are coming true. I said then that the march of this combination, this irrigation trust, would be felt in the Treasury of the United States for a great many years to come, but I did not think it would make its appearance quite at the end of a single year.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman say where he has seen symptoms of this monster.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, yes, I am going to. That is what I am on my feet for. It has organized a sectional party in the United States large enough and strong enough to take from the agricultural colleges of the country all possibility of any support out of the public lands, and has transferred it under the pretense—I use the language not offensively—that some day or other it will be turned back again into the public Treasury. It has moved its great column of political force westward until the picture which we have looked at in our younger days with so much pride, purporting to give the movements of the star of empire, turns out to be a very faint little picture as compared with the mighty progress of this combination. It has gone out into a State and subjugated it, a State with some thirty-odd thousand people, growing smaller, and threatens to create—not exactly nor by any means create as the Lord created things in the beginning of creation, out of nothing—a Senator who will be crowned with the glory of having initiated the successful battle in favor of national irrigation. He earned all the promotion he will get and I congratulate and do not envy him for it.

And I trust other States which I could name will have the wisdom to send the men who organized the irrigation scheme, and will turn over what there may be left of the assets of the Government to this monster of strength—strength alone being included in the word "monster." It has been able to repeal all the laws known to the English-speaking people touching great guaranties of human rights. It is now proceeding to have the courts of the country, and especially the Supreme Court of the United States, if possible, hold that it is not the province of water to run downstream by any means, but that the purpose of a stream with water flowing in it is only to permit the fellow who gets there first to take the water out of the river and let the fellows who are down below whistle for water. This is called Anglo-Saxon progress.

Mr. Chairman, I fought against the progress of this combination once, but I witnessed the strength of it, and I appreciated it. It is not so strongly represented now as it will doubtless be in the Fifty-ninth Congress, when there will be six more irrigated and irrigation Senators and four more irrigated Members of the House of Representatives. The eastern portion of this country—the people who are paying taxes upon hundred-dollar land—will have but little use to appeal to the Government, for all of the resources of the Government are to be expended for the purpose of taking the public lands of the country, quadrupling them in value and selling them to purchasers, and then giving the money to the combination that has got up this irrigation scheme. It is too large a contest for me. I retire with whatever honors I may have won by an exhibition of more courage than discretion, and I shall never oppose an appropriation for it again until it gets so large that the pay of Congressmen is affected by it, and then I will rebel. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say on behalf of the committee that the reduction which is now being considered was not made in any spirit of hostility, either to irrigation itself or to the gentlemen who have been conducting the investigations provided for by past appropriations. Neither was this recommendation of the committee made without due and careful consideration.

The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has remarked that the Agricultural Committee pays a great compliment to what has heretofore been done by this division of irrigation in its report wherein it says that the work has been so well done that it is not necessary to continue it in the same degree any longer. We considered ourselves that we were paying a compliment to the work that has been done by this division; and yet from that reason we do not think it necessarily follows that the committee is mistaken in believing that the work has been so well done that it need no longer be continued in the same degree as in the past.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SCOTT. I will.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman understands that up to this time the division has only been able to report conclusively on the water laws, usages, and conditions in two States out of the fifteen States and two Territories in the arid and semiarid regions?

Mr. SCOTT. In regard to the suggestion which has just been made by the gentleman from Wyoming, I will state now, although I should have reached it more logically later on in my remarks, that I regard very much of the work to which the gentleman alludes as being work for lawyers rather than irrigationists, and therefore not necessarily or even properly to be conducted by this division. But in regard to this work of helping the lawyers, perhaps, to reach a determination——

Mr. MONDELL. Right there, will the gentleman allow me to ask, if not properly undertaken by this division, will the gentleman suggest what Department of the Government should take it up or could take it up properly?

Mr. SCOTT. My reply to that suggestion is that the work can be properly taken up and is being taken up in very large measure by the different States which are primarily and particularly interested; and in proof of that assertion I desire to call attention to some remarks which have been made by the expert in charge of these investigations.

In a bulletin which I hold in my hand, Mr. Ellwood Meade, in charge of these investigations, makes this statement:

> The fact that the water supply is the source of all agricultural values also emphasizes the need of an efficient system of public control. Some States have realized this need and have provided for it. Colorado has 75 officials, appointed by the governor, whose sole duty is to see that the water supply is properly distributed. Wyoming has a like system, with 48 officials engaged in guarding this water supply.

I wonder if the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] does not consider that the 48 officials in his own State are competent to investigate and report upon this work?

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman wish me to answer that?

Mr. SCOTT. I would rather be allowed to conclude my remarks.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I did not know but the gentleman wished an answer to that question.

Mr. SCOTT (reading):

> Nebraska also has a similar system. Utah and Idaho have also made partial provisions for accomplishing this result.

And in the hearing before the Agricultural Committee, Mr. Meade said also, referring to the legal phase of the question:

> There are associations that work on this measure in every one of the States. There is an association in Washington, in Oregon, in Montana, and one in California.

I submit, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that the work which has already been done by the irrigation division of our Department has been of use in stimulating and perhaps in directing to some extent the action of the States themselves, and that the States now are entirely competent to carry on that work to its completion. I submit that it would not be a proper function of the Federal Government, it would be indeed an absolute impossibility for any official of this Government, to go into any State and attempt to dictate the legislation which that State should enact.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOTT. As I have just stated, this work has proceeded to such an extent that in the matter of its legal phases it can now, in the judgment of the committee, be prosecuted entirely successfully by the associations which have undertaken to establish uniform laws and proper local regulations in the arid States.

Now, aside from the legal phases of the question, there are only two or three large questions involved in the matter of agricultural irrigation. The House should remember that this is not a new question; the art of irrigation was old on the North American continent before the Pilgrims landed at Plymouth Rock. There is no necessity for extensive and expensive experiments and investigations, as there would be if we were entering upon an unexplored field. All that we can properly do, it seems to the committee, all there is need to do, is to provide a bureau where information may be obtained, which will keep in touch with the development of new methods and new machinery and give that information to the people as they may request it. And I may say here that the pressure upon this division for information does not appear to be very great. Mr. Meade himself stated before our committee that the inquiries received by his division number about twenty a week. He says they "sometimes reach twenty a week;" from which I understand that is the largest number they are likely to receive in any one week. And it seemed to the committee that the appropriation which they have made will abundantly provide for the corps of experts which may be necessary to furnish this information.

It has been necessary in the past, and some of the most advantageous work that has been done by this division has been to determine the duty of water—that is, the amount of water needed for irrigation. The division has been very useful also in pointing out the loss that might accrue on account of seepage and leakage of the water in the irrigation ditches. But sufficient investigations have already been conducted along these lines to reach a determination of these questions, as far as they can be determined in a wide general way. Investigations in the matter of seepage, for example, have shown that there is a loss of from 15 to 75 per cent in the water between the point where it enters the ditch and the point where it leaves it. Now, the very fact that there is so wide a range of loss is evidence that the question is one of individual cases almost entirely.

The investigations already made have been sufficient to put people who intend to engage in the irrigation business upon their guard and admonish them that they are likely to lose a great deal of water. But when it comes to the question of how much they shall lose, every individual case must be the subject of separate investigation. It depends upon the character of the soil, upon evaporation as affected by locality, and questions of that kind which will be readily suggested by experience and common sense. Now, in view of the fact that the great big problems connected with this matter have already been practically solved and that nothing remains but to apply the knowledge gained to individual cases, it seems to your committee that the appropriation suggested and recommended in this bill will be amply sufficient to meet future needs.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman wish the House to understand that it is generally conceded that this question has been solved or that it has been largely solved?

Mr. SCOTT. That statement was perhaps a little too broad if I said it was generally conceded.

Mr. MONDELL. I never heard it conceded.

Mr. SCOTT. I will say this, however, that the reports which have been published, comprising 25 separate volumes, aggregating 2,500 pages, and which I have taken pains to carefully examine, certainly demonstrate to me that the great big problems have been solved, so far as they can be applied in a general way, and that by the aid of a small staff of highly trained experts here at Washington the different States will be well able to carry forward the work that remains to be done for the continued development of irrigated agriculture.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that all debate upon the pending paragraph and amendment be closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves that all debate upon the pending paragraph and amendment be closed.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I move, as an amendment to that, that it be closed in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado moves as an amendment that debate be closed in five minutes. Does the gentleman accept the amendment?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think we have debated enough on the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered to the motion of the gentleman from New York—that debate close in five minutes.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 23, noes 42.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I call for tellers.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not want to be discourteous to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The gentleman represents an arid region, and perhaps it would be discourteous to him were he not given an opportunity to speak.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky insist on the point of no quorum?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I do.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate close in five minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I object to that request, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment that I want to offer and I do not want to be cut off from it.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my point of no quorum.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Colorado have five minutes and after that all debate close.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Colorado have five minutes and after that debate close. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, it seems peculiar that in an appropriation bill that has carried $65,000 a year for this work for only a limited number of years, for this branch of the service has not been in existence long, that now, when it seems that there is a strong upward movement in irrigation matters, we should have a proposition here to cut down this bill from one which can be supported by $65,000 to $25,000. The very argument the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT] has made with relation to the employees of the States of the arid West ought to impress upon this House the necessity for this appropriation. Whenever you find the States employing large numbers of men, at an expense of thousands of dollars, you may well rely upon the fact that they are accomplishing some good, and that work ought to be availed of by this Bureau itself. If Colorado has its hundreds of distributers of water and pays out of its State funds the expenses, and Wyoming has 48, and other Western States have a large number, they are collecting data, and if formulated and if directed under some general head that may be of great advantage to irrigation in this country, and that can be availed of and is now being availed of by this Bureau. But if you cut it down and cripple it so it can not do this, it is bound to injure the irrigation interests of this country.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Let me ask the gentleman from Colorado if he did not state upon this floor a year ago, when the general irrigation bill was passed, that that would have the tendency to reduce the appropriation from the general Treasury?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I don't know whether I did or not. We are not asked to increase the appropriation, but this is a bureau which it seems to me ought to, and does, avail itself of the information which it collects from State sources. Why is it that we should have this valuable bureau cut off, almost destroyed, because the reduction from $65,000 to $25,000 leaves us only a handful of men? Why should we strike that down in view of the large development that has taken place—increasing year after year—in the irrigation of lands and the irrigation questions that arise?

The gentleman from Kansas says these questions are mostly settled. Ah, Mr. Chairman, he would not say that if he lived in an irrigation State. These problems are not settled and can not be for years and years and years, if ever. Still, if you take the theory that there is nothing new under the sun, then you may say that it will stop at some time, but as long as human mind is ingenious we are going to discover new things by which irrigation problems can be made plainer and by which they can be solved.

Now, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] made a very good speech against the general irrigation bill that we had last year, but he made that speech last year, and this House voted by a vote of three-quarters of the majority against the proposition that he presented. He does not claim but what this bureau is doing most excellent work—work recommended by the very committee that reduces this appropriation. They can not say but what this work is valuable, because we know it is important. They can not say but what it is an economical bureau, because it is not attempted to ask the Congress of the United States for men to go out in the field and do actual work which the States are doing, but by reason of its position it has gone in to cooperate with the States, has taken advantage of the fact that the States pay the men, has asked the men to do work which they are not required to do, and which the State government does not require them to do, but which they are willing to do in order to help the general subject of irrigation, to obtain some knowledge on the question. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MONDELL].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MONDELL) there were—ayes 35, noes 52.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert on page 49, after line 6, as follows: "Six thousand dollars for irrigation investigation in the South during the coming fiscal year."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been closed upon this section and all amendments.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may utter one sentence.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that he may utter one sentence. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Now, Mr. Chairman, this applies to a section of the country in the South for the growing of rice, and an agent of the Government has heretofore been there, and bulletins that have been published by him have been of great value to these people.

The appropriation heretofore for this object has been $65,000. It is now reduced by this bill to $25,000. My amendment proposes to make an increase of only $6,000.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. COOPER of Texas,

The CHAIRMAN. The noes appear to have it.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I call for a division.

The question being again taken, there were—ayes 31, noes 44.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. FEELY rose.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I was going to move that the committee rise.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I had fifteen minutes remaining of the time granted me by unanimous consent. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FEELY].

[Mr. FEELY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. WADSWORTH. I now move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House as amended, with the recommendation that it pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POWERS of Maine reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the Agricultural appropriation bill, had directed him to report the same back with amendments, and with a recommendation that the bill as amended pass.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. If no separate vote be demanded, the question will be taken upon the amendments in gross. [A pause.] The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the passage of the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. On that question I call for a division.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 79, noes none.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. WADSWORTH, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUNDAY, January 25, 1903.

The House met at 12 o'clock m., and was called to order by Mr. GROSVENOR, as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We come to Thee, Almighty God our Heavenly Father, with gratitude welling up in our hearts for all the disclosures Thou hast made of Thyself unto Thy children; and especially do we thank Thee for that personal revelation in the life and character of Thy Son, Jesus Christ, through whom we are enabled to interpret to some extent the purpose for which we are called into existence. We thank Thee that we may look up to Thee and call Thee Father, realizing that in that name the whole world is akin.

We thank Thee that Thou hast bound us together, through the tenderest and sweetest ties, into families; that Thou hast bound us together by the ties of friendship, which continually enlarge the circle of fraternity, so that though we come here from widely different sections of our great country, imbued with different political views and religious sentiment, we may lay these all aside on such occasions and see only that which was noble and true and pure and just in those who wrought upon this floor.

We thank Thee for that something in us which tells us we shall never die, for that something which tells us that truth shall outlive the stars; for that something which tells us that love shall finally be satisfied.

Let Thy blessings descend, Heavenly Father, upon the families of those who are in mourning and sorrow over their lost ones. Comfort them, we beseech Thee, by the blessed assurance that by and by they shall meet in another world, where there shall be no more separation.

Help us so to order our lives that we may live each day to prepare us for the next, so that when we shall finish our course in this world we shall be prepared to enter upon the larger, grander life in a fairer world.

Hear us in the name of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

On motion of Mr. BALL of Texas, it was

DE GRAFFENREID, deceased, late members of this House from the State of Texas.—Order made in the House Thursday, December 11, 1902.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE RUSSELL, OF CONNECTICUT.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Connecticut offers a resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That, in pursuance of the special order heretofore adopted, the House proceed to pay tribute to the memory of Hon. CHARLES A. RUSSELL, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Connecticut.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a faithful and distinguished public servant, the House, at the conclusion of the memorial proceedings of this day, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk be, and is hereby, instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. Speaker, as the successor of Mr. RUSSELL, and in accordance with the time-honored custom of this House, it becomes my melancholy privilege to speak briefly in commemoration of his life and character.

CHARLES ADDISON RUSSELL was born at Worcester, Mass., on March 2, 1852. His parents were Isaiah Dunster Russell and Nancy Maria Wentworth. Through his father he was a descendant of Henry Dunster, the first president of Harvard College, and on his mother's side he was descended from Benjamin Wentworth, one of the earlier governors of New Hampshire. His great-grandfather, Jason Russell, a patriot of the Revolution, was killed at the battle of Lexington.

Mr. RUSSELL attended the public schools of his native town, those humble New England universities which have shaped the minds and characters of so many illustrious public men, and was prepared for college by the Rev. Harris R. Greene. In 1869 he entered Yale College. He was an apt and diligent student and was popular both with the faculty and with the undergraduates. He graduated with honors in 1873. He immediately entered journalism; was city editor of the Worcester Press for five years, and was also connected with the Worcester Spy, and corresponded with several of the large New York and Boston newspapers.

On May 14, 1879, he was married to Ella Frances Sayles, the daughter of Sabin L. Sayles, of Dayville, in the town of Killingly, Conn., one of the most distinguished citizens of that State, and in that year moved to Killingly and thenceforth resided there. He soon became treasurer of the Sayles Woolen Company, an official of other corporations and institutions, and a member of various benevolent and fraternal organizations.

In 1881 he was appointed by Governor Hobart B. Bigelow an aid-de-camp upon his military staff, with the rank of colonel. In 1883 he was elected a representative in the general assembly, and served with ability both on the floor and as chairman of the important committee on cities and boroughs. In 1885 he was elected secretary of the State. In 1886 he was elected Representative in the Fiftieth Congress from the Third Connecticut district. He was unanimously nominated and elected by steadily increasing majorities to each succeeding Congress, including the present one. He died at his home in Killingly on Thursday, the 23d day of October, 1902, at about 10 o'clock in the forenoon, surrounded by his family and friends. His aged mother, a sister, his widow, and two children—Sabin Sayles Russell and Deborah Russell—survive him.

Mr. RUSSELL entered upon his first term in this body with more than the ordinary experience, both in business and politics, and with more than the usual qualifications for the responsible position. These attainments, in connection with his winning personality, his cheerful disposition, his indomitable perseverance, and his innate kindness of heart, soon engaged the attention of the House and foreshadowed his distinguished subsequent career. During his sixteen years of consecutive service in this body—a period of membership longer than that of any of his predecessors or of any New England Representative now here—he had served upon the Committees on Education, Railroads and Canals, Banking and Currency, Reform in the Civil Service, Census, Expenditures in the War Department, as chairman, and the leading Committee on Ways and Means.

It was upon this last committee that his most signal services were rendered to his country and his constituents. Here his business training, his intimate acquaintance with the details of the manufacture of textile fabrics, his broad and exact knowledge of general commercial conditions, his experience upon other committees, and his knowledge of the duties of the various governmental departments and their needs, soon gave him conspicuous rank and designated him as the trusted counselor and friend of Nelson Dingley and William McKinley. His fidelity to duty, his unflagging industry, his uniform courtesy, his modest bearing, and his distinguished services in this House are still fresh in the memory of all and will be recounted by his colleagues who will soon pay loving tribute to his memory.

Standing in the shadow of our great sorrow, which hangs like a pall over the hearts and homes of the men and women of his historic district and fills this Chamber with sadness, what shall I, what can I say of him—the honored, the loved one, the friend of the old soldier, the friend of the laboring man, everybody's friend—who has been summoned from the councils of the lawmakers of earth into the majestic presence of the Almighty Lawgiver? He was a Representative in the highest and best sense of that term. Honest, industrious, capable, unassuming, and conscientious, he devoted his whole time, mind, and strength to the service of the State and the interests of an intelligent and prosperous constituency. "Seest thou a man diligent in his business, that man shall stand before princes; he shall not stand before mean men."

And so he stood, for sixteen years, like a knight of chivalry, untouched by the tongue of calumny, in the highest parliamentary assembly in the world, the trusted comrade, associate, and friend of legislators, orators, and statesmen. He made no claim to oratory—that indefinable gift of speech which stirs men's souls, but by which oftentimes the worse is made to seem the better cause—but he was endowed instead, and in a large measure, with what has not inaptly been called "the genius of common sense."

He discriminated, as it were, with an unerring instinct between the false and the true. He saw and knew men and measures in their proper relations and proportions and estimated them at their real rather than their pretended value.

This gift showed him when and how to apply to the evils of the body politic appropriate remedial legislation. He was a clear thinker and a plain talker. He illuminated his subject because he saw it clearly himself. To him language was not simply a combination of words or of articulated sounds. It was a system of expressing ideas. He was not given to much speaking, but whenever he desired to express his views he did so with that purity of diction and in that simplicity of manner which, if not eloquence itself, is close kin to it. He abhorred the babblings and mouthings of the word monger; he despised the tricks and fripperies of the mere rhetorician, and he hated the turbulence and clamor of the demagogue and the agitator. He had an aversion to all sensationalism and display. He was utterly devoid of all guile, hypocrisy, and cant. He was free from the slightest affectation. It was this antipathy to artifice which led him to reject all literary and rhetorical adornment and to rely for his effect entirely upon the logic of his thought and the lucidity of his statement.

His disposition was genial and kindly. His manner was cordial without being demonstrative. He was dignified, but not distant; reserved, but not reticent; unassuming, but not diffident. He was absolutely and wholly honest, frank, and candid in thought, word, and deed. There is some mysterious intuition in nature which defies analysis, but which infallibly marks an honest man. Whatever this influence may be it actually radiated from Mr. RUSSELL. No one could be in his presence without a consciousness of his impregnable integrity. His heart beat with kindness, sweetness, and charity, and his whole appearance, bearing, and voice were attuned to these. He inspired confidence and affection at first sight. His every instinct, feeling, and aspiration was clean, wholesome, and noble. His character was well rounded and his intellect symmetrically developed. By long and faithful service he had become one of the most trusted and honored members of this body. He was familiar with its traditions, observant of its rules, courteous to its members, attentive to its business, and proud of its historic repute as the freest and most famous popular legislative assembly of all time.

He represented a constituency composed of many elements. Sturdy farmers, toilers in mills, artisans in factories, busy merchants, and captains of industry, men who go down to the sea in ships—all the diversified interests and individuals of an agricultural, manufacturing, and maritime district were represented and protected by him. And he represented the political principles and policies of a State which had furnished Roger Sherman to the Constitution, Israel Putnam to the Continental army, Jonathan Trumbull to the Revolution, William A. Buckingham to the preservation of the Union, and Morrison R. Waite to the Supreme Court of the United States.

He had a lofty conception of the dignity and duty of the office of a member of Congress. In his view it was neither an agency for the distribution of documents and the spoils of political conquest nor a stage for the exhibition of talent, nor a theater for the display of ambition, nor a market for the barter of influence and votes, but rather a sacred ministration for which he was ordained by a great constituency to voice its principles and wishes in the supreme council of the greatest nation of recorded time. Though he was one of the most distinguished members of this body he was free from all vanity, self-assertion, and pretense—that trinity of the smaller vices which while they counterfeit greatness detract from it.

At home, in his private life, among the people he loved and who loved him, his daily walk was as a daily benediction. He was their guide, their counselor, and their friend. He joined in their pursuits, he shared their sports, he contributed to their needs, he sympathized with their sorrows, he rejoiced in their successes, and by his devotion to their interests he sacrificed his life. Among the many opportunities and temptations of long public service, where thrift might easily have followed fawning, he kept his character, his record, and his reputation spotless and free from even the slightest shadow of suspicion. At last, after a longer period than is ordinarily allotted to public life, without a spot on his record, honored and loved by everybody, "having provided things honest in the sight of all men," having fought a good fight, having kept the faith, there came the inexorable roll call, and it found him ready. "He wrapped the drapery of his couch about him and laid down to pleasant dreams."

Rated by the commercial standard, he died a poor man, but when the very name of the money king shall have passed into oblivion, the memory, the life, the character, and the services of CHARLES ADDISON RUSSELL will still remain an example and an inspiration to posterity and a conspicuous honor to his State.

Mr. CAPRON. Mr. Speaker, the poet Whittier had in mind the type of man to which our loved friend and colleague, the late CHARLES ADDISON RUSSELL, of Connecticut, belonged, when he wrote—

> Formed on the good old plan—
> A true, a brave, a downright honest man.
> He blew no trumpet in the market-place,
> Nor in the church, with hypocritic face,
> Supplied with cant the lack of Christian grace.
> Loathing pretense, he did with cheerful will
> What others talked of while their hands were still.

As often as I have attempted to prepare such words as would serve to express my thoughts upon the life and character of CHARLES A. RUSSELL, I have found the written sentences ringing formal, perfunctory, and hollow, so will content myself with simply recording the sentiments which my heart in its love for him prompts. It was to the heart that my friendship for Mr. RUSSELL appealed first and strongest. In every hour of my Congressional life as it touched his I knew him best as one, first of all, who loved his fellow-men.

Others will tell of his public life and labors, of his strength of character, of his fearless courage in the cause of right, of his high and unfailing sense of honor, of his devotion to plain duty to the limit of martyrdom, and of his genius for hard work and the success which crowned his efforts.

Of the lovely and loving heart which never failed those who were allowed within its citadel it is mine to recall. He sought me out upon my arrival at the Capitol, prompted, perhaps, first, because his district joined mine, and the interests of business and friendship do not halt at the imaginary line which divides the States of Connecticut and Rhode Island. Kindly counsel as to the great economic problems then being settled he gave me, and as one of the leading spirits engaged in the formulation of the schedules of the Dingley tariff, he took pains to daily advise and instruct me. So inspiring was his smile, so cheering his voice, that the day when I did not sit and talk with him had something wanting which could not be gained elsewhere. As with myself, so I found at length it was with other men. They trusted CHARLES A. RUSSELL with a rare confidence that his judgment was unerring and his instincts sure.

In all the years when health was his he was never pessimistic or cynical. His faith in men was dominant. His creed was that men average honest, though recognizing human limitations and weaknesses.

The love of country burned ever an altar fire in his soul. A purer, truer patriot never breathed.

A quiet joy at the success of the policies he had helped to enact, resulting in the prosperity of the workers of the land, abided with him always like an atmosphere.

It was my good fortune to go with him through his district during the last campaign he made, and I shall never forget the expression of absolute trustful satisfaction everywhere expressed by the people we met. His genial, manly, and quiet, though forceful, addresses were universally satisfying. The hearty hand grasp which whole communities came to bestow, and the words of approval of his course in public life had nowhere one discordant note. So long had he known this people, and so well, it almost seemed that he kept in touch with the home life of each family.

It was with satisfaction that I attended the convention which last nominated Mr. RUSSELL with enthusiastic acclamation. Although it was universally known that there was not an opposing vote in his party, there was a full attendance of the delegations, and the grief at the report that he was too ill to attend the convention was profound. A resolution asking the candidate to attend to the recovery of his health and assuring him that the delegates to the convention would attend to every other needful thing to assure his triumphant reelection was enthusiastically voted.

A few days later he went to his reward, and the whole community in which he had lived and labored came, men and women and children, from the mills and farms and shops, bowed with a grief such as it is not often the lot of men to inspire.

But beyond and above all the qualities which so endeared this man to his town, his State, and the nation, the love which his great heart held for his home and his own was that which most deeply appealed to those who knew him best. As husband, as father, as home maker shall I recall him to my last day. To have known CHARLES A. RUSSELL in this relation was a benediction to any man's life.

God grant that we may not miss the lesson his life and death teaches.

Mr. SPERRY. Mr. Speaker, this day has been set apart for the memorial services to the Hon. CHARLES ADDISON RUSSELL, late a member of this House from Connecticut. Having known and loved him for many years, both in and out of Congress, I can not refrain from adding a few words of tribute to his memory in addition to those already spoken.

It is with a sad heart that I speak of one who was called away from us in the full vigor of his manhood, when his usefulness to his State and his district, which he served so faithfully for many years, was at its height. His record and career are those of a man ever just, ever lovable, ever upright in all his dealings with his fellow-men.

I first knew of Mr. RUSSELL as a student at Yale. Here he endeared himself to his fellow-students, just as he did later to those he came in contact with in the sterner walks of a busy life. He was ever known affectionately as "Charlie," a name that clung to him from his college days to the end, though honors and dignities were thrust upon him. His geniality and his lack of formality were responsible for this, and it was a name he loved to hear from the lips of his friends.

Mr. RUSSELL, as a member of Congress, was alert and consistent in all the duties required of him. He was ever ready to help a needy constituent, and it was not strange that he was beloved and honored by all to an extent that falls to the lot of few men. He was a large-hearted man, broad in his sympathies, full of love and tenderness for all in want or distress, a companion unexcelled, a man true and steadfast in his friendships. I do not believe he ever wronged a single person or swerved from the path of a noble life.

His family ties were exceptionally strong. His love and devotion to his wife and children were apparent to all. His solicitude for their welfare was ever uppermost in his mind. He loved children. To the very last he took a deep interest in their sports and their games, their little troubles and their pleasures. Many a time this whole-souled man, the best part of whose life was spent as a legislator of national reputation, would stop and watch the children of the village school at his home playing in the school yard. He was always a welcome visitor. They looked upon him as a friend and comrade—one who did not hesitate to join in their sports, and who could be a boy with them—though cares and responsibilities weighed upon him. His sunny nature shed a luster wherever he went, and no company, where he happened to be, could be dull.

His was a life that we, who survive him, would do well to remember and honor. The last year he was among us he was struggling bravely with an insidious disease which would sooner or later end his mortal career. Yet not a murmur escaped his lips. He was hopeful to the end. If he had at times doubts as to his recovery they were not made known to his family or his friends. He was always looking on the bright side of life, and it was his aim to shed happiness and sunshine wherever he went. Gloom and despondency were not a part of his nature.

The people of his district loved him. Most of his life was spent among them, and in his younger days he was always prominent in all their festive gatherings. He loved to mingle with them, to greet them with a hearty grasp of the hand, and in return to receive their love and friendship. They learned to know his ability and his worth. They appreciated the faithfulness and devotion with which he served them. His memory will ever be green in the hearts of the people he represented so long, so devotedly, and so ably. When the sad news of his death spread throughout his district, sorrow and mourning could be seen on every hand—the genuine grief of friends and neighbors, who loved him as a man and respected him as a true and honest politician.

Mr. RUSSELL had strong political opinions. He was firm and inflexible in his adherence to them, both by his vote and his speech. Yet so kind and gentle was he in his acts and dealings, so just and considerate of all who entertained opinions in opposition to his, that he has taught us how a member of this House can be a true and loyal party man and still maintain the friendship and respect of all he comes in daily contact with.

He died as he had lived—beloved and respected by all who were so fortunate as to be able to claim an acquaintanceship with him. To the end he was cheerful, ready to take up his life work, and solicitous for the welfare of those around him. It was the bravery of a noble heart facing death's problem, not shrinkingly, but courageously, with faith in the benevolence and justice of his God and Maker.

It is only a few weeks ago that his earthly remains were committed to their last resting place. The little village of Dayville, in which he lived, was crowded with mourning friends from all parts of the State. A delegation composed of members of the Senate and the House was there. The people of his home village, and for many miles around, did homage to their departed friend. The little children of the village school lined the sidewalks, and not an eye was dry. It was a touching tribute of devotion to the memory of a man they were proud to call their friend. Fragrant flowers, the gifts of sorrowing friends, filled the house, shedding their sweet perfume. Here, too, the great esteem in which he was held by his neighbors and townspeople showed itself. A wreath of roses sent by the school children, who gladly contributed their pennies to honor the memory of their lost friend, was a touching token of their affection.

With his devoted wife and children around his lifeless form, his earthly body was laid away, to await the summons of Him who said: "I am the resurrection and the life. He that believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live."

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, on the 23d of October last, CHARLES ADDISON RUSSELL, in the fiftieth year of a useful and busy life, died in his own home surrounded by his family and friends.

A few days later he was buried in the village where he had lived and among the associates whom he had loved.

It was not a funeral in the sense that it was only the laying away of a body from which life had gone, but it was the sad parting of friend from friend and a tribute of respect to his character and memory from the whole State which he had served so long and well.

The flowers which covered the casket and filled the chancel of the church in rare profusion were beautiful, but the tears which flowed unbidden from every eye were the real expression of the regard of those who had come, not to pay formal respect to an honored citizen, but to bid a sad good-by to one they loved.

It was a wonderful demonstration of what a place a man can make for himself in the hearts of his fellow-men by a life of usefulness to others rather than of selfish devotion to one's own interests.

And this, I think, was the secret of his success, for success he had, and in a marked degree.

It is not success to secure a fortune and nothing else in life. That grave is empty which holds a corpse and does not make to some one a sacred spot where it lies buried.

A statement of dollars left behind is the poorest epitaph of which I know put upon a tombstone.

One kind word spoken here, one good deed done to a fellow-man, would outweigh them all in the life eternal.

In the whole history of Connecticut but one man has rendered longer service in the House of Representatives. That man was John Davenport, who was a member of nine Congresses, dating from 1799 to 1817. Mr. RUSSELL served eight terms, and at his death had been renominated for the ninth.

J. O. Mosely, from the Second district, and Benjamin Tallmadge, from the Fourth, had eight terms each, but no man from the Third district, which Mr. RUSSELL represented, had ever equaled him in length of service. And, indeed, for more than a century the average length of service from that district had been but a little over two terms each.

But in 1887 CHARLES A. RUSSELL, then a comparatively young man, began to represent the sturdy farmers of the Third district, the rock-ribbed home of Republican faith in Connecticut, and from that time on, down to his dying hour, held the confidence, respect, and love of all his people.

Visiting New London one day last summer, I met one of his warm personal and political friends. He told me that he had just received a letter from Mr. RUSSELL, who was up on the coast of Maine. In that letter he asked the question, "Do you think my people will reelect a man to Congress who is as sick as I am?" and the answer went immediately back, "You need have no anxiety whatever about a renomination or election."

He had absolutely devoted himself to their service. He had been faithful in little things as well as large ones. Nothing was allowed to stand between him and them. His only thought was for their welfare. No sacrifice of health or strength or time was too great for him to make in their behalf, and he did it all so pleasantly and in such a kindly way that each task seemed a privilege rather than a burden put upon him.

This was the way he won their confidence, and they gave back to him devotion for devotion and love for love.

Almost his last words were to advise concerning his successor and ask for him a like support.

As a legislator his work was always well done. He was not a brilliant orator in the sense that he charmed an audience by flashes of wit and studied phrases and practiced posings, but he spoke fluently and straight at his subject, with the one purpose of convincing men and securing adherents to his cause.

He was not a genius, as the word is generally used to describe one who originates great policies or leads new movements on radical lines, but he did possess an analytical mind and power of judgment which drew men back from swift conclusions and held them beside himself on the solid ground of established and proven facts.

If he had been a soldier his place would not have been on the skirmish line, but in command of the reserve to safely hold every position gained and strengthen it as a base for further operations.

He was a man upon whom his party and his colleagues could rely and in whose matured judgment they could unfalteringly trust.

His life will be an inspiration, his work a far-reaching benefit, and his death a lasting sorrow to the people of Connecticut.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I first met CHARLES A. RUSSELL twenty years ago, when we both commenced political life as members of the Connecticut general assembly of 1883. Mr. RUSSELL was then a young man in the early thirties, fine looking, with an unusually attractive personality. Although comparatively a stranger in his adopted State, yet his happy, cheerful ways, genial manners, good-fellowship, and intelligent comprehension of his public duties won him immediate confidence and prompt promotion, with merited popularity that never waned but constantly increased during the passing years.

Mr. RUSSELL was in the public service continuously for nearly twenty years. Faithful to every trust, winning golden opinions from all with whom he came in contact, he occupied an assured place in the hearts of his constituents, as well as in the estimation of the people of the entire State, irrespective of party lines.

It is not too much to say that no public man of his generation was more highly esteemed and respected than our lamented friend, and I but restate a generally conceded fact when I say that had Mr. RUSSELL'S life been prolonged the highest political honors a State can confer awaited his acceptance.

In this place and presence I need only refer to Mr. RUSSELL'S distinguished services in this august body. Other friends and fellow-members now present will bear witness of his fifteen years of faithful Congressional work.

Clear in intellect and of sound judgment, always candid and truthful, life brought to Mr. RUSSELL a full share of duties, toils, and responsibilities. These were invariably manfully and wisely met and overcome. Burdens were assumed and carried without a thought of trifling or evasion. Modest, kindly, dignified, courageous, every public and private obligation was at all times conscientiously discharged.

Mr. RUSSELL was a dutiful son and a kind brother; in his home, beside the family hearth, he appeared at his best; in him wife and children found an affectionate and devoted husband, a fond and indulgent father, whose loving solicitude was ever faithful and alert. As a friend Mr. RUSSELL was loyal and true, sympathetic and helpful, an altogether safe counselor and wise adviser.

Mr. RUSSELL was long favored with robust health and when stricken by a fatal disease, with death's gloomy shadows gathering around him, he, with undaunted courage, bravely maintained his usual buoyant spirits. Indeed, he slightly resented the sometimes too solicitous intimations of his friends that he was not in normal health. His cheerful, hopeful disposition was never more in evidence than during his prolonged struggle with the grim destroyer, continued unrelentingly through many suffering, anxious months. During all those weary days and nights the battle for life was fearlessly fought until the closing act brought a happy release to his worn, sweet spirit.

The grave has seldom received the mortal remains of a nobler, worthier man than the one his friends were wont to lovingly call "CHARLIE RUSSELL."

With but a scant proportion of worldly goods, Mr. RUSSELL leaves his children the far more precious heritage of an honored, untarnished name, and the blessed memory of a useful, well-spent life.

At all times a gracious gentleman, the great poet's eulogistic lines are tersely descriptive of our departed friend:

> His years but young, but his experience old;
> His head unmellow'd, but his judgment ripe;
> And, in a word (for far behind his worth
> Come all the praises that I now bestow),
> He was complete in feature and in mind,
> With all good grace to grace a gentleman.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, as we pause for a brief time to pay a parting tribute to one who was so recently among us an active, living force and is now silent in death, it is fitting that we turn from the turmoil of life and seek this quiet peaceful day of rest in performance of this duty. It is to be hoped that the precedent so recently established will be followed hereafter, and that no other day than the Christian Sabbath will be chosen by the House for a public memorial to any of our members who have been removed by the hand of death.

There is no forum in the world in which a man's character is so truthfully appreciated as in the House of Representatives. The daily assembling where mind meets mind, often in sharp debate, or in earnest, honest criticism, brings out all that there is in a man, good or bad. Hence, it is that the average impression of the House is an honest judgment of every member. Partisans are fair here in weighing the character of their opponents; and after party strifes are over for the time, evenhanded justice is meeted out by political opponents. These are some of the bright flowers that hang over the walls that divide parties; they are the pleasant tokens that lend cheer and pleasure to Congressional life.

Not that the House is always a garden of flowers. Each man, if he has real worth, is stirred in defense of his own opinions, and often there is fierce conflict and real warfare. We witness here the survival of the fittest, and the judgment of the House is fairly made up on the merits.

CHARLES ADDISON RUSSELL entered the House with the Fiftieth Congress, and had served here for nearly sixteen years at the time of his death. On the floor of the House he was an admirable legislator, never speaking without having something to say that illuminated the subject under discussion and enlightened the House. He always commanded attention and respect. Whenever he arose to address the House his colleagues had reason to expect a plain, unvarnished, straightforward statement, not wearisome by repetition nor shrouded with needless words calculated to conceal thought or the absence of it, as is sometimes the case. After listening to a clear and lucid presentation, the wish came to us that he would the more frequently address the House. Kind, genial, and gentlemanly, with the courage of clear conviction, he was accustomed to impress his thoughts upon others with great success.

But his real strength of character displayed itself in committee work. It was my privilege to be associated with him in the Committee on Ways and Means for nearly eight years. Our relations were intimate and cordial. Seldom did a question arise upon which I did not find that he had bestowed much thought and generally had a definite, clear-cut opinion. While he believed in his conclusions, he was ready to listen to the views of his associates. If they presented to him a better reason, he had no such pride of opinion as to prevent his acknowledgment of a mistake.

In no place is a man's mental caliber more thoroughly tried than in such committee work, for example, as the preparation of a general tariff bill. Mr. RUSSELL was one of the eleven men who prepared the so-called "Dingley bill" in 1897. He contributed his full share to the formation of that measure. For more than the half year that this act was in contemplation in either House of Congress he was a constant attendant at all the meetings of the committee and an inveterate student of all the conditions surrounding the work. The business of his life rendered him an expert on all matters relating to the textile schedules. But he was built on a still broader plan—his college training, his wide reading upon economic subjects, his thorough study, and his never-failing conservatism and good sense rendered his advice invaluable to the labors of that committee. The chairman of the committee and each associate leaned upon him for advice. As one of his colleagues upon the committee I cheerfully acknowledge the aid he rendered me at all times during our long and intimate association.

Mr. Speaker, it is fitting that we who survive him should stop for a brief moment and place wreaths of affection upon the grave of CHARLES ADDISON RUSSELL. We mourn his untimely end. Having just passed the age of 50 years, he was at the full zenith of his power and gave promise of many years of great service to his State and to his country. He was popular among his own people. In a recent campaign it was my good fortune to spend a little time in his district and State. He was the idol of his constituents, and his name and character were honored throughout the State. His friends looked for higher honors for him, believing that his character and usefulness had hardly begun in its strenuous growth.

His failing health was noted by his associates early in the last session with much concern. How bravely he combated the encroaching disease, how faithfully he bore up in order to fulfill his duties here, those who were closest to him can testify. Never a murmur of complaint, making light of his ills, he proved himself the same brave character his life illustrated so fully. He died in the midst of his labors and surrounded by the tokens of success.

We bring flowers to his grave to-day. How many of us contributed a single flower along his pathway in life, wearied as he often was with the exacting labors of his position? We are accustomed to observe the old Latin maxim and speak nothing but good of the dead. It is well; yet I think we too often speak good of the dead only. We come far short of our duty to our brothers, except we speak good of and to the living. More here than elsewhere, however, have I heard men utter words of cheer and good will, with just praise to their fellows. How much better than to wait until their ears are stopped in death.

Our friend has departed to the unknown. We miss his genial presence, his kindly greeting. We miss him in committee, where his influence was wont to smooth out difficulties and dissensions; we miss him in the House, where he was often instructing us and influencing our final judgment; we miss him in the social life, which renders our occupation here tolerable; he is missed in the home circle, that seemed so attractive to an on-looker. His State and his country will miss the service of one of the best of their sons. And yet we can but think that he has gone to something better; that there is a life beyond, rendered brighter by faithful service and good works here. We can but hope that our loss is his gain.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. Mr. Speaker, I knew CHARLES A. RUSSELL intimately. We were fellow-members of the House for seven years, during five of which we were colleagues on the Committee on Ways and Means and on a subcommittee, and during four of which we had a permanent pair. Being so closely associated in the business of the House, scarcely a day went by when the House was in session that we were not more or less together. I never knew him to have had an ungenerous impulse or a mean thought. I never knew him to do an act unworthy of a manly man. He was a Republican, I a Democrat, but such was the breadth of his nature that he was never limited by party in his friendships nor in his relations with his fellow-members.

RUSSELL is dead, and these eulogies of ours can not bring him back to us; yet there is some satisfaction in being able to tell each other of the affection, the esteem, and the honor in which we hold his memory.

The loss of an able and honest man seems to us a misfortune, even when it is evident that his race is run and his task complete. But it is to our limited comprehension almost calamitous when he whose loss we have sustained was in the full vigor of manhood, with apparently many years of public usefulness before him, and with what was the almost certainty of eventually crowning his career with a seat in the other branch of Congress. And yet in the scheme of Divine Omniscience nothing occurs by accident. In the constant and triumphant evolution of the human race, which leads us day by day and year by year nearer to our Maker, every atom of humanity has its own part assigned and has its own duty to perform. The end never comes until in God's good time that part has been played or that duty done. No man ever dies until he has accomplished the purpose for which he was placed on earth. When the gifts given a man are great, then is his responsibility the greater. When those gifts are applied as the Giver of all true and perfect gifts intended that they should be, then has their possessor not lived in vain, but has aided according to his ability the march of the evolution of humanity.

RUSSELL was endowed with an even, gentle, kindly disposition. Industrious and painstaking, he had become one of the best informed men in the United States upon the great national question of the tariff. His sterling integrity caused him to apply his knowledge conservatively. Never an extremist, profoundly convinced of the truth of his convictions, whatever he did was done in what he considered the cause of righteousness, whatever he accomplished was in what he thought the best interests of the people.

Throughout the long months of suffering that preceded the end, when for his health's sake he should have left the task of legislation to others, he stayed at his post unflinchingly, never complaining, never sparing himself, always cheerful, no matter what the effort cost him, always ready and anxious to bear his share of the work of the House, no matter how much he might suffer as the result.

Other men have lived whose deeds have been more spectacular and who have more directly influenced the course of history, other names there are that have more space in the annals of the nation. Yet, when the record is made up at the end of time, when the last account is balanced between the good and the ill we have done, no page will be more pure or spotless than that upon which is written the name of CHARLES A. RUSSELL—an able, honest, kindly gentleman, who never failed to do his duty, and in doing it added to the sum of human exellence and aided the progress of mankind.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, this Sabbath service to the memory of our dead colleague appeals strongly to my sense of the fitness of things. Heretofore it has been the custom of the House to turn abruptly from affairs of state to these memorial services, and the custom has little tended to induce and stimulate that spirit of reverence and sorrow which belongs to our regard for the dead. It is more appropriate far, it seems to me, that we should meet for our present purpose while Christian men and women, if not devoting their thoughts to sacred things, are, at least, seeking rest from the cares and burdens of every-day life, and having in mind the ideals of which such life is largely destructive. In this Sabbath calm, amid the company of Sabbath worshipers, I come to lay my humble wreath on the tomb of my departed friend, CHARLES A. RUSSELL. He was my friend and I was his. To me his memory is and ever shall be sacred.

While during the last session of Congress he seemed to those of us who knew him intimately to be fading from day to day and maturing for eternity, nevertheless when the end came and we knew that he was no more the shock was great. Genial, sunny CHARLEY RUSSELL, he has outrun the rest of us in the race for the unknown, has anticipated us in solving the great mystery. "If a man die, shall he live again?" is the question that with Mr. RUSSELL's death comes to each of us anew in personal and searching form; the question as old as the race and as unanswerable now as when first put by human weakness and human doubt. Does he know to-day that loving hearts are mourning his loss? Is he walking now the Elysian fields in sweet converse with the friends who preceded and the friends who followed him—with Dingley, with whom he was associated here, and with Reed, only recently stricken? Shall we know him again and he us when our turn shall come to cross the dark river?

These are the questions the like of which press us for answer whenever into our circle, as the Latin poet has it, "the pale messenger comes who with impartial footstep knocks alike at poor man's cot and palace gate." Had we no answer to the question, no solution of doubts in divine revelation, we would still find the answer in the immortal qualities of head and heart that belonged to our departed friend. It is impossible of belief that the native virtues, the acquired accomplishments, the growing ability, the maturing but unmatured capacity to accomplish results represented in the brief life of Mr. RUSSELL should prove fruitless and unavailing even in the economy of natural law. And so while we say to-day in sorrow "good-bye," we say also in hope and confidence to him upon whose brow is the light of an eternal day—"good morrow."

Born in Worcester, Mass., only a little more than fifty years ago, Mr. RUSSELL's life repeats in its beginning the history of the New England boy of comfortable birth. His first education was had in the admirable public schools of his native city. This was followed by discipline under a private tutor, Rev. Harris G. Greene. Then came four years' experience as a student amid the elms of Yale, in the atmosphere of that grand old university whose traditions and customs are those of a true democracy, where wealth nor influence prevails as against merit; where, be his condition as to name and fortune what it may, "a man's a man for a' that."

The modest little school founded two hundred years ago by men of prayer and faith, with the avowed purpose to fit young men "for public employment in church and state," has nobly fulfilled its purpose. Prayer has found its answer and faith its fruition in the great university the roll of whose sons in civil life, in legislation, in the administration of law, in deeds of valor in every war where courage and patriotism have carried and defended our flag, lends luster to every chapter of our country's splendid history.

On that roll of honor CHARLES A. RUSSELL has a conspicuous place. It matters not how much he did—rather what he did; he did what he could, and what he did was good and was well done. It is only natural to believe that it was here in this scholarly and inspiring atmosphere that there entered into the young man's soul the ambition to enroll himself among the sons who, by engaging in public employment in the State, should fulfill Yale's high purpose. He was a faithful student and graduated with honor as a scholar at the age of 21. Returning then to his native city, he became the city editor of the Worcester Daily Press, a position which he retained with great credit for six years. Subsequently he served for a short time in an editorial capacity with the Worcester Spy. Later on, after his marriage in Connecticut, he moved to that State, and thenceforward his life history is connected therewith. He engaged in business there and became identified with its politics. He was appointed an officer on the governor's staff. He became a member of the State legislature and served upon important committees. He was elected secretary of state. Then he came to Congress in the Fiftieth Congress, when and where I first met him, he and I being both new members. As Yale men we naturally came together at once, beginning a personal friendship which was intimate and cordial down to the time of his death.

The period covered by Mr. RUSSELL'S service has no parallel in importance in all our country's later history outside of the period covered by the civil war. Within it were stormy and tempestuous discussions over great economic questions and their partial settlement. Our friend listened to the debates on the Mills bill and saw it go down to defeat. He witnessed the struggle over the McKinley bill, and was on terms of intimacy with the great and loving soul that gave it its name. With all mankind he shared in the sorrow and joined in the procession that followed McKinley to a martyr's tomb. He took part in the deliberations that resulted in the passage of the Wilson bill and like the rest of us felt and appreciated its results. He was a factor in the legislation upon the financial question, a question which swept the country like a hurricane and was dominant not alone in the determination of our policy and the choice of our rulers, but in the determination of our national destiny. He was one of the committee that framed the Dingley bill, and foremost amongst those who held up the arm of our great and lamented leader. Of the six minority members of that committee not a single one now remains in the House. Of the eleven majority members only six remain in the House, and when this Congress shall expire only four will remain as members of the next House. Two have died, two have gone to the Senate, and three to private life.

He was in the center of the storm that with such fury beat upon the House following upon the tragic sinking of the Maine in Habana Harbor and that swept the House with irresistible force into the declaration of the Spanish war. He witnessed the triumphs of our Navy in that brief and decisive conflict and rejoiced with all his countrymen in the luster that American valor lent to American arms. He took a conspicuous part in the deliberation upon and in the decision of questions following upon that war's close. He saw our flag carried and planted far beyond our borders, and appreciated the importance of the great questions that such adventure called upon us to face. He saw the opening of a new century and with it the beginning of a new national destiny. Of all the important happenings of the period to which I have referred it was his to say "quorum pars fui," and as to all his acts and doings in connection therewith he went down to death with the happy consciousness of duty faithfully done. There is no spot on his escutcheon, no rust upon his armor. Like the great untitled Frenchman of Napoleon's army, he is "dead on the field of honor."

Mr. RUSSELL was a man of strong intellect and, preeminently, of good judgment. His ruling characteristic was practical common sense. He was well poised; not without enthusiasm, but not given to extravagance or hysteria. He was deliberate, judicial in his make-up. He would have adorned the bench. He was honest of intellect. When I say honest of intellect, I speak advisedly, for there is more than one kind of honesty. To keep promises, and pay debts, not to cheat one's neighbor is one kind of honesty; but that kind of honesty may consist with the dishonesty of intellect which permits a man to cheat himself, and in pursuance of personal ends to play the demagogue. Mr. RUSSELL never could have been a demagogue. He was as intellectually as he was personally honest. He reasoned straight. He thought honestly. His mental processes were clear. He never was even honestly misled. He was a useful man. He did things. He was a man of high ideals, and loyal to them. He was a forceful man, because he lived for a purpose and kept it always in view. He was courageous without boasting, and true to his convictions as the needle to the pole. He was a modest man, but modesty could not hide his virtues, and his fellows appreciated him more than he did himself. His virtues shone in his daily life and demanded recognition. He was a clean man, above suspicion; an honest man, above question.

He had thus, as I have shown, the qualities that lie at the base of efficient public service. I am aware that the language of eulogy is generally the language of extravagance, and remembering this I believe that I have not done myself injustice in what I have said, but only have rendered justice to our dead colleague.

Far away in importance above and beyond the life that the most illustrious man leads in the public eye is his home life. No relations so sacred as those that cluster around the hearthstone. No test of character so true as that which measures loyalty or disloyalty to home duties.

Mr. RUSSELL was a man of pure and simple life. The altar at which he worshiped was in his home. The wealth of his affection found its objects there, and the dearest wishes of his great heart found their highest gratification in bringing happiness to those of his household. However much Connecticut may mourn the loss of her distinguished son, the grief of all griefs, into which we may not intrude, is that of those to whom he was not statesman or legislator, but husband and father. From our standpoint he died all too soon. But we are not keeping the books. The Master is. He knows both sides of the account. It is ours to believe that he closed CHARLES A. RUSSELL'S account when, in the eternal fitness of things, the balance was on the right side.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, the death of CHARLES A. RUSSELL came to me as a personal sorrow. I made his acquaintance at once upon his coming here in the Fiftieth Congress. He represented the district in Connecticut in which I was born and I felt something more than an ordinary interest in him, and hence sought his acquaintance at the outset of his career. Later he became a member of the Committee on Ways and Means and served on that committee until, by his death, that committee suffered an irreparable loss. He was a member of that committee at the time pending the interval between the election of William McKinley and the assembling of the Congress at the special session called by the President in 1897. The Republican members of the committee prepared the Dingley bill, and he was a faithful, intelligent, efficient, and valuable member of the committee until his death.

He was not a man given to display or show on the floor of the House or in the committee room, but there was not a member of that committee whose opinion was accepted as of greater value than was his. He enjoyed the full confidence of Mr. Dingley. He was a man of laborious tendencies. He never took hold of a matter that was of interest and laid it down until he had mastered the full details of it, and understood all that was to be ascertained by investigation. As a representative from his State he was especially valuable and untiring in representing the special interests of Connecticut and New England. There was no article manufactured in that great, busy hive of manufacturing industry that he did not understand the genesis of its production, the details of its progress, and the success of its growth and development, but he was not narrow or provincial. He brought to the discharge of his duties broad views of patriotic purpose and wise application of facts to principles.

Amid the perplexing questions of detail that constantly arose at every step of our pathway in the development of the Dingley bill, he never lost sight of principles as well as details of special situations. He dealt with the questions which arose with a mind almost judicial in its development, and he was free from prejudice, bias, or hasty decision. He had broad intelligence and far-reaching knowledge. His thorough education had well fitted him for the acquirement of knowledge, and his mode of thought enabled him to master details while not losing sight of generalities. His views were always valued by his colleagues and great attention was always paid to his suggestions.

He was an able and valuable member of Congress; not one who displayed his efficiency in the forum of debate, but one who had a clear understanding of the questions before him and who drove straight at the purposes which he formed. So much for his ability.

I do not know what his early occupation had been, excepting as it appears in his brief biography in the Congressional Directory. As I have said, he represented the district in which I was born. I first saw the light of day in the little country hamlet of Pomfret, only a few miles away from the home of RUSSELL and the place of his death.

I visited his district, calling upon friends of my father at the home of my infancy. I met the constituents of RUSSELL at one of their county fairs. I saw many of them during the time that I spent in Connecticut; and I was delighted to learn, as I did learn from all sources of information, that he had a strong and abiding hold upon the confidence and esteem of his constituents. They believed in him. They appreciated his qualities of mind and heart. They understood him fully. They looked up to him. He represented in his mental characteristics and the sternness of his principles faithfully the old-time, honored, and beloved State of Connecticut—the State that we laugh about sometimes, sneer at, it may be, occasionally, but, after all, a State that stands to-day typifying in her social, industrial, and political attitude and purpose the true representative of the old-time New England. She has produced great men, sturdy men, men of high character, men of national repute, and in her fallen son her true characteristics were strongly presented and truly expressed.

I can not speak of RUSSELL without going to the personal view. He was not a man demonstrative of his friendship, but he was a man who impressed his good qualities upon those with whom he came in contact. If ever there was a man who despised false pretenses and who looked past the surface to the matter of intrinsic merit, he had that faculty, and hence to be his friend and to be recognized as his friend was not only a pleasure, but was moreover a distinguished compliment, which no one who knew him would fail to appreciate. He was by no means taciturn among his friends. He was by no means lacking in humor and appreciation of a good thing, but he was careful in all he said to offend no one unnecessarily and to always fully appreciate those by whom he was surrounded.

One of his great characteristics, and one that could not be hidden from his associates even though he should have tried to do so, was the strong love and deep filial affection that he had for his family. I think that when he began to appreciate that his health was failing, as he did appreciate a considerable time ago, his deep concern was not for himself—self in that instance was a secondary consideration—but it was his anxiety for those he loved with such intensity of affection. He spoke often of his children. He was proud of the progress that his son made in his studies and he did not hesitate to manifest the pride of a fond father, but his reference to his personal affairs was never obtrusive, but always thoughtful, wise, and judicious.

I do not know what were his religious opinions; I never heard him express them. That he was a Christian in all the essential elements of Christianity I never doubted and do not doubt now. Whether or not he was an adherent of a creed, and if so, what creed, I can not answer; but the old proposition that would have applied without qualification to our friend. He lived and exhibited the principles of Christianity, and, having done so, the question of his belief is not essential.

> He can not be greatly wrong
> Whose heart is in the right,

He fell in the very zenith of his usefulness. He had reached a position of influence and of power, and was certain to have reached a high place, with broader opportunities, but he fell short of the fulfillment of his modest ambition.

He left behind him a record that will be a monument of emulation to those who are to follow him; he left behind him sorrowing friends and weeping relatives; he left behind him admiring associates and a constituency always glad to do him honor.

We shed here a tear of friendship; we come with warm hearts to do him honor; we speak of him as we knew him and as we loved him.

Mr. MCCALL. Mr. Speaker, I do not take the floor with the hope that I can add anything of weight and beauty to the eulogies that have been so fitly spoken, but I am unwilling that this occasion should pass by without a word to hint at the high esteem in which I held CHARLES A. RUSSELL. I cherish his memory because of his long and honorable career, because of the fine qualities of manhood which ennobled him, and because I am glad to believe he was my personal friend, as I was his. A native of the Commonwealth of which I have the honor to be one of the Representatives, identified during hismature years with the neighboring State of Connecticut, from which he received his various commissions for public service, he was a genuine product of New England and in him were easily traced the simple and uplifting discipline of her life.

He had the inheritance of sterling qualities of mind and body; he was nurtured under institutions which are unsurpassed in the freedom of thought and speech, and in the generous invitation they extend to the individual man to make the most of the powers God has given him. His strong mental characteristic was, I think, the tact with which he would endeavor to secure the cooperation of other men in bringing about what he might wish to accomplish. Firm, but not assertive, utterly lacking in the vanity that leads to self-exploitation, his efforts did not excite personal antagonism.

He was sagacious in detecting the weak points of measures he did not like, but he was measured in his criticism, kindly and fair in his methods, and his manner never wounded the self-love of those who were working for other ends. He was an antagonist to whom it was easy to submit and over whom one would prevail with regret rather than with elation. He did not often claim the attention of the House in debate; indeed, speaking as he did with force and vigor, he was among those who spoke too rarely. It was a pleasure to be associated with him in a common cause and to rely upon his ready resources and his choice gift of common sense.

He inspired one with a sense of his reserved power and, equal to any position which he held, you felt that he would be equal to any public place, however high, to which he might be called. The House does well to pause to-day and take note of the great loss which it has suffered. A strong, manly man, a sweet-hearted friend, a devoted and distinguished servant of the State has fallen. While we pay our heartfelt tribute to his memory let us take into our hearts the lesson of his noble life.

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, this service, in memory of the Hon. CHARLES A. RUSSELL, late a Representative from the Third district of the Commonwealth of Connecticut, brings with a peculiar force some recollections attending my entrance here as a member of this body.

I was from the State where resided in the campaign of 1896 a great standard bearer who had been overpowered by superior numbers, and the fires of that conflict had not yet died out. I was a member of a political party that by comparison was small in number. It was said by some that these conditions were much against my service as a member of that body. Personally this had but little effect upon me, having learned to be always stout of heart and remembering when troubles and difficulties come "They all shall pass away."

Experience teaches the thoughtful man that it is not of much consequence what others say, but it is of the greatest importance what he does; that in this life there must be no drifting; there must be a settled purpose to reach a given point; there must be a policy laid down and worked to all the way along. All new Congressmen soon discover that they can elect between two policies—whether they will confine themselves to being of service to their people by looking diligently after their many wants, or, by frequent speech and interview, attempt the difficult task of leadership. I adopted the first-named policy, for it was within my reach and more to my liking; but, being without experience, it was necessary for some one who was well prepared by long service to "lend a hand" to the end that it might become effective.

Just at that time Mr. RUSSELL came to me as a volunteer in the most kindly and whole-hearted manner and offered any service that he could perform. The antithesis of my political conviction, a stranger, he based his proffer on the ground that as I had been born and grown to manhood in his district he was interested that I should give a good account of myself, being a kind of a constituent of his. Appreciating the genuineness of his offer, I was quick to avail myself of his suggestions as to methods of departmental work.

In this presence I publicly acknowledge my debt of gratitude to Mr. RUSSELL and testify to his helpful nature and his great ability. He held out his hand to me, not because my kinsfolk lived in his district and I might be of service in a political way, but because he was a manly man and well knew in his own heart the natural law that no person ever forgets his birthplace.

While I love my adopted State, where I have lived all my manhood years, where is located my permanent home, and where I shall rest at the last, yet at times my heart turns with love and veneration to the old homestead in New London County and takes a pride in the history of the Commonwealth of Connecticut. May I have force of character enough and grace great enough to prove myself a worthy son of that old Continental State.

When the word came of the passing of Mr. RUSSELL it was to me a personal sorrow that such a kindly soul could not be of further help, and that his individual counsel could no longer avail. Then I thought that his influence is still in the world, for that which is good can not die. Though the law of the material realm tends to dissolution, no mental force, no spiritual energy, no moral principle, ever dies.

The material world is dominated by an immaterial principle, and in all the universal realm there is no such potent force as love. Itself unarmed, it disarms all its adversaries. This is the power that ruled the subject of this memorial occasion. He was gentle, helpful, and earnest in all his dealings with men.

This principle was not only the potency that ruled, but the monitor that guided his life. Those who knew him well learned that his course and reckoning were—

To love some one more dearly every day,
To help some wand'ring child to find the way,
To ponder o'er a noble thought and pray,
And smile when evening falls.
To follow truth as blind men long for sight,
To do the best from early dawn till night,
To keep the heart fit for His holy sight,
And answer when He calls.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, one of the earliest acquaintances I formed upon becoming a member of this body in the Fifty-third Congress, or nearly ten years ago, was that of the gentleman to whose memory we are paying tribute to-day. From that time until his last illness our friendship was cordial and sincere. I therefore do not desire that this opportunity shall pass without adding my tribute to the character and services of the late CHARLES ADDISON RUSSELL.

In the later years of his public service I was associated with him on the Committee on Ways and Means and realize that in his death we have lost a statesman whose public and private life was ever above reproach.

His acts and motives were at all times dictated by an intense desire to do only that which was right and just, and which would reflect the greatest honor upon his State and country. He was broad minded, liberal in his views, never influenced by narrow prejudices, and in every sense a typical American, whose future was full of promise.

The death of Mr. RUSSELL was sincerely mourned by the entire people of his State. It was my privilege to attend the funeral services at his home in Connecticut, and I do not believe I ever witnessed expressions of more sincere and genuine sorrow than on that occasion, and I had an opportunity to learn of and observe the high regard and tender affection in which he was held by his neighbors and constituents.

Mr. Speaker, the world is better for his having lived, and we should all be proud to follow the upright course he pursued.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I have information that there are some other gentlemen who would like to bear witness to Mr. RUSSELL'S memory, and I therefore ask unanimous consent that general leave to print be granted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, that leave will be granted.

There was no objection.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE SHEPPARD.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolutions which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas offers the following resolutions, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That in pursuance of the special order heretofore adopted, the House proceed to pay tribute to the memory of Hon. JOHN L. SHEPPARD, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Texas.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a faithful and distinguished public servant, the House, at the conclusion of the memorial proceedings of this day, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk be, and is hereby, instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker—

With noiseless tread death comes on man;
No plea, no prayer, delivers him;
From amidst busy life's unfinished plan
With sudden hand it severs him;
And, ready or not ready, no delay,
For to his Judge's bar he must away.

And thus it came upon JOHN L. SHEPPARD. The death angel found him ready to meet the summons. We who mourn his going feel a sweet satisfaction in the sublime Christian faith ever cherished and continually expressed by our departed colleague.

It was perhaps my lot to know him more intimately and for a longer period of time than any other associate here. For twenty years my acquaintance with him was intimate. In every walk of life my knowledge of the man was complete. My first recollection of him was when I knew him as a strong and handsome young man just beginning the practice of the law. He was of a robust and well-rounded figure, weighing nearly 200 pounds, and I then thought him one of the most superb specimens of physical manhood I had ever seen. He was strong, handsome, intrepid, and magnetic to all who met him. One look into his manly face convinced anyone of his unswerving honesty and the dauntless courage which characterized his every deed. He was born at Bluffton, Chambers County, Ala., on April 13, 1852. In 1858, with his mother, he removed to Texas. He was educated in the common schools of Texas, and was denied the privileges of a university education. He studied law under his own tutelage and was admitted to the bar in 1879.

Within three years after he came to the bar he was elected district attorney of the fifth judicial district of Texas, in eastern Texas, where I was reared and knew him so well. His career as district attorney was an exceedingly brilliant one. I never knew a better prosecuting officer. I was admitted to the bar during his incumbency as district attorney and have been in the court room with him for days and weeks and watched him prosecute the pleas of the State. Day after day, week after week, and month after month, I have heard him announce himself ready for trial with the State's cases and proceed without the least evidence of fatigue or exhaustion. His physical strength and unflagging mental powers in that direction were marvelous. He always knew his cases, and prosecuted with zeal, justice, and vigor.

I never knew him to persecute or take an advantage of a defendant or his counsel. He scorned the abuse of place and power. He relied exclusively upon the law and the facts in every case. He resorted to no wiles or tricks. It is simple justice to him and current history of his State to say that no more successful or able prosecutor in his district ever appeared for the State. In my judgment, the court room is the great forum for eloquence. Within its walls I have heard him rise to the loftiest heights of fervid eloquence. At times he thrilled his auditors and the jury with the feelings that only the truly eloquent can arouse. His acts and record as district attorney were so characterized with fairness, justice, and mercy that at the end of his term of service as district attorney his people promoted him to the district bench. There he sat and presided with dignity and honor for eight years. It was my pleasing privilege to assist in elevating him to the bench.

His record as district judge was peculiarly able. During his eight years of service on the bench he was reversed but once, in a criminal case, by the appellate court. In this case he was not reversed on a proposition of law, but because he refused to permit a juror to impeach his verdict. Representing the State in the appellate court at the time, it was my opinion that the higher court, and not he, committed error. It is most probable that no nisi prius judge has ever equaled this conspicuous and remarkable record.

So upright and honorable was his career as a judge that he might have easily remained on the bench indefinitely. But he chose to retire voluntarily to resume the practice of the law. So acceptable were his services as an official his people would not permit him to remain in retirement. In 1898 he was elected to Congress by the Democrats of his district, and he doubtless could have remained in the House of Representatives as long as he might have desired had he been spared. But death came and removed him from these scenes and the walks of men, leaving behind as a sweet benediction to his friends and family a brilliant official service, a conspicuous professional career, and an unsullied private life.

Mr. Speaker, what more could mortals crave? The grave closed over him in honor, and we mourn our colleague here to-day and truly realize that our acquaintance with him made us better and augmented our admiration and love for our fellow-man.

Mr. Speaker, I knew him in every walk of life—as citizen, as lawyer, as district attorney, as a most just judge, as a faithful Representative in Congress, as father, as husband, as friend; and in each sphere I do no violence to truth in saying he came up to the truly ideal standard. It was my privilege to sit by him in this Congress. His religious views were known to me. He was a Christian in every sense of the word. He went to the great hereafter without a murmur and without a doubt. His life went out not as sinks the evening sun behind the western horizon, but as the morning star which melts away into the light of heaven.

Standing in the midst of the living, we know not why this untimely summons, but, with the poet, let us believe that—

We will shortly know that lengthened breath
Is not the sweetest gift God gives His friend,
And that sometimes this sable pall of death
Conceals the fairest boon His love can send.
But not to-day; then be content, sad heart.
God's plans, like lilies, pure and white, unfold;
We must not tear the close-shut leaves apart;
Time will reveal the calyxes of gold.
And if, through patient toil, we reach the land
Where tired feet, with sandals loosed, may rest,
When we shall clearly know and understand,
I think that we will say, "God knew best."

Mr. BRANTLEY. Mr. Speaker, the Angel of Death has visited the present Congress with such unusual frequency as to have almost ceased to be a stranger. Each visit, however, has made a fresh vacancy in our midst and added a new grief to those we already bore. As we meet from time to time to mourn an absent one and pay loving tribute to his memory, we are brought on each occasion to a fresh realization of the fact that to meet and mourn is all that we are given the power to do. It would not profit us to inquire as to the cause of these visitations, whether they be few or many. The mysterious summons from the unknown world beyond comes to a colleague, and he silently obeys and takes his place with the great majority, and that is all we know. We can not lift the veil that divides time from eternity, nor can we understand the workings of an all-wise Providence. We bow in submission to that which we can not avoid, but which we believe to be the decree of Him "who doeth all things well." We do not question its wisdom, bewail as much as we may the anguish of heart and mind that it entails. How impotent and helpless stand all human agencies in the presence of the work of the dark Angel of Death! Too weak to help and too ignorant to know, humanity can only voice its despair, until the inspiration comes to turn to Him from whom came the chastening blow.

We have met to-day with bowed and submissive hearts to pay the last earthly tribute that we as a body can ever pay to the memory of our late colleague, Judge JOHN LEVI SHEPPARD, of the State of Texas, who departed this life between the time of our last adjournment and our reconvening in December.

Judge SHEPPARD first looked into the world in the State of Alabama, where he was born in 1852. Alabama did not claim him for long, however, as early in his life, when he was only about 6 years of age, his widowed mother moved to the State of Texas, and it was in this great empire, magnificent in its territory, its resources, its achievements, and its possibilities, that he grew to manhood and imbibed the large ideas and lofty inspirations that won for him the just recognition of his fellow-men. Texas, too, was the scene of his early struggles and triumphs and also of his greatest achievements, and as this great State honored him, so did he honor her in the name he builded for himself.

Strong and secure in the esteem of his fellows, it was but natural for him to be called to high and responsible places, and once called his vigorous mind and honest manhood made it easy for him to maintain himself. I speak but common repute when I say that his ability and faithfulness for six long years in the office of district attorney of his State were responsible for his being called to the higher office of district judge. He entered this latter office well equipped for its arduous duties, and so ably and impartially did he perform its labors that, upon leaving it, at the expiration of eight years of service, he had intrenched himself for all time to come in the hearts and the minds of the people whom he served.

He came as a Representative of his people to the Fifth-sixth Congress, and it was here that I was first permitted to have personal knowledge of him. He brought with him to this new office the qualities of character and of learning that make success. He had the independent and the aggressive assertion of the prosecuting attorney, directed and controlled by the calm reasoning of the judicial mind. He was possessed, too, of broadness and liberality in his views, reflecting thus the environment in which he was reared and in which all his life's battle had been fought.

Very early in his career here he demonstrated the caliber of which he was made and the high motives that impelled his conduct. His standing in the House was secure almost from the day of his entrance into it, and each day that he was here he added to the warmth of the friendship his colleagues bore him. He was not permitted to serve long enough to accomplish for his people and his country all that he had planned to do, nor did he live to witness all the beneficent results of what he did accomplish. He did live, however, to know and enjoy the confidence and esteem in which he was held here, as at home, and he died rich in the consciousness of that much achieved.

When he entered the Fifty-sixth Congress, he came among us apparently as strong in body as in mind. As I now recall him at that time, I can see no trace of weakness anywhere. I see the full-grown man, strong and robust, the picture of mental and manly vigor. I see one to whom mature years had come, but come to strengthen and adorn and not to weaken. It is thus I love best to recall him, and it is thus that he was during the life of that Congress, the period that marked the brightest and the most useful part of his Congressional career. It was during this time that he stamped his individuality upon the House, and taught us to know that in his political faith, as in all his acts and doings, he knew no higher, better word than that of duty, and that the shrine at which he worshiped most was that of loyalty to conscience and to country.

When the time came for the Fifty-sixth Congress to pass out of existence, possibly none of us suspected when the separation came that a few short months would work such serious and deadly changes in our colleague. We all remember his return to the Fifty-seventh Congress, and how concerned we were to see the unerring symptoms of the dread disease that had fastened itself upon him, and still we knew not the extent to which its ravages had then gone. His ardor had not cooled, his courage had not abated, nor was there any seeming cloud upon his intellect, but the pallor of his face and the shrinkage of his figure told the story of a strong man's undoing. For a short time after his return he earnestly strove to live up to his maxim of duty, and, neglecting nothing, he was active and alert in all matters affecting his constituency. And then came the sudden crushing attack. Without warning, he was stricken almost unto death. We were not prepared for the suddenness with which the collapse came.

Well do we remember the long and anxious waiting that followed upon this attack and how, with alternations of hope and despair, we waited while the days lapsed into weeks and the weeks grew into months, until finally the day of adjournment arrived, and still our colleague had not returned to his place among us. We adjourned, cherishing the hope, slight though it was, that in this supreme contest of his life the outcome yet might be in his favor. The hope was in vain, for the great giver of life and death had already decreed that never more should Judge SHEPPARD sit in the American Congress. The end came after we had returned to our homes, and it was there that we learned that all his long and patient suffering and all his brave and heroic fight had been without avail. When the final summons came for him to cease struggling and join the mighty hosts that had preceded him, he calmly passed away, supported and sustained by that lofty courage and sublime faith that had ever been characteristic of him.

Mr. Speaker, his memory is worthy of a better eulogy than I can utter, but in my humble effort to do some justice to it, I am consoled by the reflection that during his daily walk in life he builded for himself in the hearts of all who knew him monuments richer and more enduring than words, however beautifully spoken, can build. He was the architect of his own eulogy and when he died the work was then completed.

I knew him in the House and in the committee room, and I know something of him, too, in his social and family life, and all that I knew of him was good. In all his relations, as husband, father, citizen, and statesman, to know was to admire him, and to think of him now is to mourn his absence.

His clear and analytical mind, his vast store of useful knowledge, the high standard by which he measured things, and his intense loyalty made him the useful and forceful legislator that he was, and made him a factor for good and for usefulness wherever he chanced to be. His kind and sympathetic disposition, his loving and affectionate nature, and his comprehensive grasp of the great purpose of life, made him an ideal husband and father and a friend to be cherished and ever remembered.

Truly he was well equipped to make the journey of life, and so well did he deport himself on this but once to be made journey that wherever he tarried he left an impression that is now a benediction, and all with whom he traveled now mourn and lament the comrade they have lost.

His sage advice and cheering words and the inspiration of his courage are closed to us forever, but we are rich in their remembrance. We deplore his absence and grieve that he is away, and yet we remember that not only does death come to all, but that—

> Death's but a path that must be trod,
> If man would ever pass to God.

He has but trod the path that stretches out before all mankind, and passed into the radiant presence of the everlasting God.

Mr. BALL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, Alabama has contributed in generous measure toward the citizenship of the Commonwealth of Texas, but she never gave to us a truer or nobler son than my friend, the late Representative from Texas, JOHN L. SHEPPARD.

It is with some degree of diffidence that I rise to pay a feeble tribute to his memory. Were I to say all that is in my heart, I might give offense to his memory; because, to a man like him, whose greatest attribute was that of modest worth, anything which might appear fulsome would be offensive. And yet, cherishing his memory as I do, and loving him as I did when alive, I would not be just to myself if I did not attempt to say something on this memorial occasion.

JOHN L. SHEPPARD was essentially a man of the plain people. He came to Texas with his widowed mother when only 6 years of age. He knew what it was to be acquainted with poverty, to struggle, and to touch with bare feet the plowed as well as the unplowed ground. He had no advantages of education, save such as he acquired by his own indomitable will, impelled by a laudable ambition to stand out among his fellowmen. The only education he received, save such as came to him from research or reading, was in the common schools, and that not during sessions like unto those now afforded by the splendid public school system that has been established in our State, but only at odd times, between the laying by of the crops and the gathering of the harvest. Small wonder then, with such experience, that throughout his after life, when great honors had come to him, he still maintained a close and affectionate appreciation of that great class of our people who earn their living by the "sweat of their brow."

"As in water, face appeareth unto face, so the heart of man unto man," and his great heart always beat in unison with those who like him knew what it was to suffer hardship, privation, and disappointment.

Cherishing an ambition for higher things, the limitation upon his efforts, imposed by necessity, so retarded him that he was almost, if not quite, 28 years of age when he obtained admission to the bar and began the practice of his chosen profession, the law. He was soon thereafter elected to his first office. Opportunity came and knocked at his door, and he became the district attorney of his district; and as has been so well said by my colleague, Mr. HENRY of Texas, who had the privilege of knowing him longer than I, no more fearless, vigorous, and yet fairer prosecuting attorney ever stood up for the majesty of the law in the Lone Star State. No man of such high estate, if he violated the law, but that all the energies and efforts of our dead friend were brought to bear to make him subject to the law. Nor was there any so humble, no citizen of such lowly estate but that he could rest secure in the faith that so long as JOHN L. SHEPPARD was the representative of the State all the constitutional safeguards intended to encompass the liberty of the citizen would be thrown about him.

From this position he rose to that of district judge, and as such, by his firm and impartial discharge of duty and his clear conception of law and equity, he made a record perhaps unequaled in the history of the judiciary of our State. After six years' service as district attorney and eight years as district judge, he retired to the practice of his profession. Two years afterwards he came, where his ambition long pointed, as the representative of his people in the halls of Congress. His record here is known to you all. Faithful in attendance upon the sessions of the House, zealous in looking after the interests of his constituents, intelligent and capable in the discharge of his every duty, he won the respect and confidence of the membership of this body, and endeared himself by stronger ties to his constituents at home. And then, in the very zenith of his usefulness, in the full possession of his matured intellectual faculties, with apparently a long career of effective service before him, when only 50 years of age, he was cut down.

I remember the last time our friend's voice was raised in this Hall, scarcely a week before he was stricken. He then rose in the seat before me to deliver a eulogy upon the life and character of his dead colleague, Robert Emmet Burke, who, like himself, was a native of the State of Alabama. Less than a week after that, on Saturday evening, he was before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, of which I am a member, urging the interests of the district which he represented. Already the "bat-like wings of death" were hovering about him, marking him for its own, and yet he stood up and clearly and intelligently pressed upon our committee the interests to which he was "faithful unto death." The next day the news came that he was stricken and that there was but little hope of his ultimate recovery. When the tidings came to this House, I recall how anxiously the membership inquired about him, and with what feelings of sympathy and of sorrow the announcement of his almost hopeless condition was received by everyone in this House—members, officials, employees, and all who had had the privilege of knowing this lovable man.

Mr. Speaker, when we have passed the springtime and the summer of life, and the autumn, with its sere and yellow leaf, and then the winter, and when three score years and ten have whitened the hair and furrowed the brow, we can reconcile ourselves in some degree to the approach of the dread messenger who lays all men low. But when a man like Judge SHEPPARD has reached a position where enlarged opportunities for usefulness spread out before him, when more capable than at any time in his life of rendering further and yet more distinguished service to his State and people, and Death knocks at the door of such a man, it almost challenges our faith to be able to say, "He doeth all things well." And yet, Mr. Speaker, if we deny ourselves that submissive faith, that hope, the consciousness of a better world yet to come, there would be nothing left in life to spur us on to higher endeavor.

Mr. Speaker, it is with reluctance that I invade the inner circle of his life and speak of his family associations; and yet, why should I hesitate to do so? No more beautiful exemplification of an ideal home life could be found in the history of any man. The tenderness, the sweetness, the devotion which characterized his relations to wife and children, who were as devoted to him as he was devoted to them, will always remain as a sacred consolation to the survivors of his family. When he was stricken and his family gathered around his bedside here in this city, a devotion such as I have never seen surpassed was exhibited, and when in that struggle for life, because he was not willing then to die, nor were his family willing to give him up, some of his loved ones were always with him as he went from place to place in search of some restorative or climate to combat the grim reaper who was slowly drawing him closer and closer into his deadly embrace. But the struggle was hopeless, and when at last he was laid at rest by loving friends who had the privilege—which was denied to me, being upon a sick bed at the time and unable to attend—I am told that no such concourse and outpouring of the people was ever had in all the history of that section of country as came to pay the last tribute of respect beside the bier and at the grave of our departed friend. I am sure that had he known what substantial evidences of appreciation were to follow, his dying moments would have been greatly cheered and comforted.

I know from close personal relations with him how devotedly he was attached to his eldest son, now his successor, and what pride he took in his achievements and prospects. Having been denied the privilege of educational advantages himself, except in a limited degree, how joyous and grateful he was when that son achieved distinction at the University of Texas and at Yale; and, Mr. Speaker, if the veil that parts us from the invisible world could be drawn aside, we know that we should see him looking down upon people whom he had so long and faithfully served, pronouncing a benediction on them for their action in sending that son by a phenomenal majority to worthily fill the place vacated by his death. It was a great tribute to that son, and it is also the greatest tribute that could have been paid by his people to the memory of JOHN L. SHEPPARD.

Our friend is dead, and yet he did not live and die in vain. While apparently there should have been many years of usefulness in store for him, and it is hard for us to reconcile ourselves to his removal from our midst, yet may we not find some comfort in the thought that the force of his example, the integrity of his life, his splendid devotion to his watchword, "duty," finding always satisfaction in service and sacrifice, will abide with us always as a legacy that may be increased by following in his footsteps.

To his loved ones we can only say in the language of the Master, "let not your heart be troubled," for has He not also said, "I will not leave you comfortless."

We know by that faith which abounds in the breast of every rational man that when the time comes, and we shall also stand on the brink of the dark river and the icy waters of death begin to break about our reluctant feet, we shall stand not as those without hope, but straining our vision across the murky water, we may hope and believe that we shall see and know him there as we saw and knew him here. To family and to friends I would say take "heart of hope," for "beyond the sunset's radiant glow" we shall yet stretch out our hands and reach the grasp of his hand, which never touched ours except with the clasp of friendship and fidelity, and look again into that calm, steady eye that never quailed in the presence of danger, but was ofttimes bedewed and humid with love and sympathy when the sorrow of others called brave men such as he to exhibit those crowning graces.

Words are powerless to express the deep regret that animates my heart by reason of the untimely taking-off of my friend. If I have been unable to express adequately the appreciation and affection that I had for him living, it is but the feebleness of speech and not lack of a heartfelt sorrow, which would fain give utterance to the wealth of affectionate regard in my heart for him who is "not dead, but gone before."

Mr. RANDELL. Mr. Speaker, on this memorial occasion our hearts are burdened with sorrow, moved by sympathy and love and buoyed with hope. Sorrow at the loss of our colleagues, sympathy for their trials and labors, love for their virtues, and hope inspiring our souls with the belief that their achievements will contribute to the uplifting of humanity, and that our bereavement is but temporary—incident only to a transition into a broader and higher sphere.

To portray the life and character of the kind, sympathetic, brave, generous, big-hearted DE GRAFFENREID has been assigned to others. To say (in addition to the more extended remarks of others) a few words concerning the Hon. JOHN L. SHEPPARD is a privilege accorded to me.

Judge SHEPPARD was my friend. In every walk of life he came up to the full standard of a manly man.

As a friend, he was true; as an associate, pleasant and affable; as a worker, serious, dilligent, and devoted to duty. Representing the people, he labored for their interests. Profound in thought, earnest in conviction, he led, rather than followed, the popular thought, but yielded loyally to the will of the people and his party on declared principles and policies. He was a thorough Democrat, a devoted Texan, a lover of the South, an enthusiastic, patriotic American, whose heart glowed with love for the human race and burned with desire for its advancement.

It was my privilege to work with him during his last labors, and it is my pride and pleasure to record his tireless energy and unswerving fidelity.

A few hours before he was stricken down by disease I accompanied him on a hearing before the Rivers and Harbors Committee, where he zealously and ably advocated the improvement and navigation of Red River. His work has done much to accomplish the end he so earnestly desired.

He has been compared to the gnarled oak that in its rugged strength had withstood the fury of the storm, yet bore evidence of its ruthless power. The figure is good. By untiring effort, sterling worth, and lofty purpose he rose from humble obscurity to the proud position of representative and leader of his people. The record of his life proves the assertion that "Genius is work, work, work!" But this sturdy scion of a mighty race did not stand alone. The clinging vines of family ties it cherished and supported wrapped their arms about and covered with verdure and bloom the scars of toil and conflict.

JOHN L. SHEPPARD was indeed "a family man." True and tender to wife and children, blessed and happy at home, he carried the inspiration of his hearthstone into public life, intensifying and consecrating his work.

He is with us no more, but his influence remains, an ever-present help. "He rests from his labors and his works do follow him." He is not dead; he is only removed from his work among mortals to the higher and boundless glories of immortality. May He who "doeth all things well" give to the bereaved family consolation and that "peace that passeth all understanding"

As the mantle of Elijah, at his translation, fell upon the shoulders of Elisha, so may the mantle of our departed colleague fall upon his son and successor, consecrating his life and labors to usefulness and honor.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a copy of a sermon delivered by Rev. D. F. C. Timmons, A. M., pastor of the State Line Methodist Episcopal Church South, at Texarkana, Tex., of which church Congressman JOHN L. SHEPPARD was an honored member. I ask unanimous consent that that sermon may be printed in the RECORD as a part of these proceedings.

There was no objection.

The sermon above referred to is as follows:

Rev. D. F. C. Timmons, A. M., pastor of State Line Methodist Episcopal Church South, Texarkana, Tex., spoke as follows:

My friends, were I to announce a text illustrative of the character of our deceased brother, it would be this: "Well done, thou good and faithful servant." Matthew xxv, 21.

It was a saying of Callimachus "'Tis ever wrong to say a good man dies," and why should we announce this afternoon that Hon. JOHN L. SHEPPARD, our friend and brother, is dead? He was a good man, and God's finger touched him and he sleeps. He is not dead. The body—that noble form which God gave him—is indeed dead, and no more in this life may we again see the manifestations of his great soul in faith and love, and the activity of his strong and powerful intellect in thought and deed.

Hence we gather together in these memorial exercises to do honor to him who has done so much for us, and to cultivate the fond hope that his noble deeds for God and home and country will continue to linger in hallowed influence about us, as the stars of evening continue to shine over the place where the sun goes down. It has ever been the sacred custom of a noble people to hold in loving memory their illustrious dead. When Moses, the great lawgiver of Israel, died on Pisgah's top, for thirty days the children of Jacob mourned and wept, and afterwards they moved forward to their Canaan's home. There are times when communities and individuals and the whole land are called upon to stand with bowed heads in one common sorrow. To-day our great Commonwealth bows her head in solemn grief. Her sister States have flashed along the wires their warmest and tenderest sympathies.

And why do we all thus mourn? Because Texas has lost one of her noblest sons, one of her distinguished men, a strong and powerful statesman. The manly form of the Hon. JOHN L. SHEPPARD has passed behind the veil, to be seen no more in this life. His able pleadings in the court room will be heard no more, his eloquent and stirring appeals to his people will be heard no more, his wise and able counsel at the Capitol of our nation and his splendid abilities as a Congressman have ceased forever. And his constituency, as the voice of one man, exclaims, "Well done, good and faithful servant!"

But while this is sadly true, it is with special delight that we say to this vast audience that the pure sweet religion of the Lord Jesus Christ claims the illustrious man whose death we so deeply deplore and whose fair name we all delight to honor. It is a peculiarity of the Christian religion that she is willing for the plaudits of tongues, and the highest eulogies of friends shall be heard, but still she reserves to herself the sacred privilege to say the last and best words about the distinguished statesman and her noble son.

The fame she gives him transcends the fretted, earthy sphere, where all human renown is spent, and widens over the vast expanse where angels enjoy glory, honor, and immortality. Faith with godly jealousy will be ever jealous of the luster that will glow around his name as a citizen and as a statesman and a Christian gentleman. For while he served his country, blessed and loved his home, he recognized the Scriptures of all truth and God as the author of these truths, and he studied to know the one and carefully to do honor and homage to the other. On Saturday morning, October 11, 1902—

> The black camel, Death, stood suddenly at his door,
> And he mounted at once, to return nevermore.

The silver cord was loosed, the golden bowl was broken, the pitcher was broken at the fountain, and the wheel broken at the cistern, and the dust returned unto the earth as it was, and the spirit returned unto God who gave it.

Hon. JOHN LEVI SHEPPARD was born April 13, 1852, in Chambers County, Ala. He came to Texas in 1858, studied law, and began its practice in 1879; was elected district attorney of the fifth judicial district in 1882, held this office for six consecutive years, and in 1888 he was elected district judge and held this position for eight years. The record he made as district attorney and judge is one of unusual merit. He was elected to the Fifty-sixth Congress and reelected to the Fifty-seventh Congress and was nominee of his party for reelection when death came.

Mr. SHEPPARD was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. He was true, tried, and unfaltering in his faith. It should be an inspiration to the splendid youth of our great West, indeed to our whole nation, to know that our country is Christian; it is not infidel, and it never can be so until it suffers subversion from the foundation stone. The great Webster spoke truly when he said, "Christianity is the common law of the United States." Happy are that people whose lawmakers and rulers are righteous men; happy are that people whose leading men avouch the Lord to be their God.

It is a cheering reflection that this stalwart statesman, during all his private and public life, stood ever ready modestly to announce his faith in the Christian religion and when necessary firmly to maintain it. During his last fatal illness he was calm, patient, hopeful, trusting in God. He remembered the tragical sufferings of Jesus Christ, his Lord and Master, and did not draw back from its logical purpose. He called to mind that the Son of Man suffered for the good of men, and the disciple could not be above his Lord. He was willing for God to have his own way. His faith grasped the thought that God reigns, and what he wills is best.

Surely no other trust in God can bring peace to the mind of man less than this great faith in Providence, and this resignation to the will of God leaves us to suffer all the pangs of uncertainty and to fret away existence until the shock of death bursts on our startled souls and reveals to us the stern realities of the eternal world. From whatever standpoint we look at this noble life, we discover excellence. As a citizen he was faithful to duty, and being honored by his people he felt the trust was sacred and his efforts were well-nigh supreme to meet every expectancy.

He did not disappoint the splendid citizenry that composed the district he represented. In social life he was affable, generous, thoughtful, and great-hearted. In his home he was kind, devoted, manly—at once the husband, the father, and the gentle companion. As an evidence of this look at the vast concourse of citizens that to-day weep around his bier; look at the splendid family that sit here weeping and do him honor. These strong young men, these queenly daughters, this devoted wife, all announce the splendor of the character of the man called husband and father.

This illustrious statesman, as we discover, was not confined to a small section of our great country, but Texas in her greatness and our nation in her magnitude forget party lines, and all, of whatever political faith, unite in sadness and sorrow and love as we gather around the new-made grave and tenderly lay away the lifeless body that once contained a great and noble soul. My friends, the shadow of death has thus fallen upon a happy home, a sorrowing Commonwealth, a great nation, and a consecrated and soul-inspiring church. It is just and due that the flag of our country should infold his casket or hang at half-mast, the evidence of a country's real grief. But why indulge in words of sorrow? He is not dead, but sleepeth; and one day we hope to see him again. And now we say farewell—but not forever—golden-hearted friend, patriot, husband, father, and Christian brother.

Mr. FEELY. Mr. Speaker, when a member of this honorable body approaches for the first time his duty, it is with a feeling of the strongest appreciation of his responsibilities, with an almost awe-inspiring conception of his own littleness. He looks about him; the history of this Chamber flashes through his mind; the victories accomplished, the defeats suffered, the causes lost and won in this arena pass before him in one grand panorama as he sits waiting for the call of his name. He steps before the bar of the House. He takes the oath, so solemn, so awful, so sanctifying. His blood is stirred.

He takes his seat, and then, grasped in the vise-like arms of responsibility, his spirit struggles and writhes in restraint. Achievement he must have; success must be his. Accomplishment he must attain. His path is unbroken; his feet become entangled in what seems to him a labyrinth of precedent and policy. Competition is at the right of him, competition at the left of him, competition in front of him, raising hurdles to test his agility. His constituency behind him, proud and hopeful, but anxious and expectant, forbid even a restful glance to the rearward. Onward as he fights he feels the shackles of discipline grind into his flesh, and his feet stumble as the meshes of inexperience become more appreciable.

Just when the light grows dim, just when despair is driving courage from the battlements of hope, just as appears "the darkest hour"—which the poet say "is the hour before dawning"—some kind spirit approaches, some battle-scarred hero of the field of legislation steps up, grasps and stays the trembling, falling hand that bears the standard, whispers into the despairing ear the strong, kind word of encouragement, cuts the Gordian knot, fires anew the spirit of the struggler, shows the way to victory and success.

Mr. Speaker, at such a period in my Congressional life JOHN L. SHEPPARD appeared. His penetrating intellect instantly appreciated my predicament, his long and varied professional, judicial, and legislative experience enabled him to make a positively practical and correct diagnosis. His broad humanity, his innate kindliness of spirit, his charitable heart prompted him to extend a helping hand.

As time passed I came to know Mr. SHEPPARD, to appreciate his greatness, to appreciate the force of his great influence, to understand the remarkable affection which his constituency had for him. How well do I remember the sadness which pervaded this Chamber when news of his sudden illness began to be whispered about; with what reverential awe each member seemed to contemplate the possibility of his loss to this body. During the long, anxious months of his last illness, members constantly made inquiry for advice as to his condition, and when the news of his sad demise came to the members, scattered about as they were throughout the country, their thoughts of him must have been akin to those entertained by the Empress Josephine of herself, when, as she lay upon her deathbed surrounded by those near and dear to her, waiting for the moment of dissolution, she requested that a picture of Napoleon be placed where she could view it, and said to those about her: "At least I die regretted. I have always desired the happiness of France, and have done everything in my power to promote it. I may say with truth in the presence of you all who attend my dying moments that the first wife of Napoleon never caused a tear to flow."

JOHN L. SHEPPARD was proud without arrogance. He used a giant's force with gentleness. With a courage mighty he would "Dare do all that doth become a man." Refinement was in every line of his countenance, and a forbearing charity marked all of his acts.

In Pericles, Prince of Tyre, we hear Shakespeare's Marina speak to those who would deceive her, betray her, and deliver her to the pirates, lines which may well be quoted here:

> I never spake bad word, nor did ill turn
> To any living creature; believe me, la,
> I never kill'd a mouse, nor hurt a fly;
> I trod upon a worm against my will,
> But I wept for it.

Mr. Speaker, JOHN L. SHEPPARD left behind him a constituency that loved him with cause. They knew his loss. The House and the country felt his loss. The example of uprightness, integrity, and manhood which he erected for himself will be a monument more lasting than "marble or the gilded monuments of princes."

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, it was the intention of my colleague from Texas, Mr. COOPER, to be here to-day to offer the resolutions and participate in the memorial services with reference to our late colleague, Mr. SHEPPARD; but, on account of indisposition, he is not able to be present. He has desired me to request specially that he be permitted to print remarks in the RECORD.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE DE GRAFFENREID.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That in pursuance of the special order heretofore adopted that the House proceed to pay tribute to the memory of Hon. REESE C. DE GRAFFENREID, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Texas.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a faithful and distinguished public servant, the House at the conclusion of the memorial proceedings of this day shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk be, and is hereby, instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, the afflicting hand of Divine Providence has been heavily laid upon the delegation from Texas in the United States Congress since its last session. REESE C. DE GRAFFENREID and JOHN L. SHEPPARD have "embarked on that mysterious sea that never yet has borne on any wave the image of a returning sail." I knew each of these gentlemen for a number of years, and my relations with them were always cordial and friendly.

Mr. DE GRAFFENREID was my immediate predecessor in this body, and what I shall say on this solemn occasion will be concerning his life and character.

Before passing to that sad duty, however, let me yield to the personal inclination to say of Mr. SHEPPARD that I knew him as a prosecuting attorney, as a district judge, and afterwards as a practicing lawyer visiting the various courts of the State. He came up to the full measure in each of these stations, and he discharged his public duties with marked ability and unquestioned fidelity. It can be said of him with perfect truth that he was a just and upright judge. No higher eulogium can be pronounced on any civic career, for the conscious rectitude of a just and upright judge is better than the sceptered majesty of an hundred kings.

REESE C. DE GRAFFENREID was born in the State of Tennessee in the year 1859, and was a member of a distinguished family of that State, so rich in historic names.

The imperial Commonwealth of Texas is indebted to the sons of Tennessee for some of the most resplendent pages of the most heroic history that ever garlanded with glory the records of any people. From Tennessee came Davy Crockett, one of the immortal heroes of the Alamo, and George C. Childress, the author of the declaration of Texas' independence, and John A. Wharton and James W. Throckmorton and Ben McCullough and John H. Reagan, that grand old man whose fullness of years has not prevented him keeping abreast with the times and who is to-day the brilliant link which connects the splendid progress of the new South with the splendid civilization of the old régime.

Mr. DE GRAFFENREID attended the academic schools at Franklin, and subsequently graduated at the University of Tennessee at the age of 19 years. One year thereafter he received a diploma from the school of law at Lebanon and began at once the practice of his chosen profession at Franklin. These facts evidenced the precocity of his mind and gave early assurance of a future distinguished career. Shortly after graduating from the Lebanon school Mr. DE GRAFFENREID removed from Franklin to the city of Chattanooga, where he practiced law for one year, and then went to Texas, in which State he continuously thereafter resided. In the year 1883 Mr. DE GRAFFENREID began the practice of law at Longview, Tex., where his superior ability at once attracted a large clientage.

He was elected county attorney of Gregg County, and in 1888 was chosen Presidential elector on the Democratic ticket and made a brilliant campaign for the principles and candidates of his party. In 1896 he was elected from the Third Congressional district of Texas to the Fifty-fifth Congress. In 1898 he was returned without opposition to the Fifty-sixth Congress and was reelected in 1900 as a member of the Fifty-seventh Congress. He died at the city of Washington on the 30th day of August, 1902. These dates mark the limits and some of the prominent features in the career of the distinguished Representative in honor of whose memory we are now assembled.

Mr. Speaker, the death of no one who I can call to mind more forcibly emphasizes the uncertain and precarious tenure we have on life. Of stalwart and robust frame, of exceptional physical strength, in the full pulse and glow of magnificent health, he was suddenly beckoned by the grim destroyer.

I shall never forget the sensations which shocked me when I received the news of the death of Mr. DE GRAFFENREID. I did not then realize, and I doubt if any of us have yet realized, that this superb specimen of manhood was no more. Truly, his death has taught us that "there is nothing earthly certain but uncertainty."

Mr. DE GRAFFENREID was a college-bred man and had the advantages of a liberal education. His mind was a rich storehouse of poetry and mythology and history, from which he freely drew to illustrate and adorn the discourses and arguments which I have heard him deliver on the hustings and at the bar.

For four years I was prosecuting attorney in the district which included the county in which he lived. He enjoyed a very large practice, both civil and criminal, and was exceptionally fortunate in securing verdicts. He and I were frequently opposed in the trial of causes in the courts. In the management of his cases he was keen, alert, and possessed of rare tact and judgment, and in presenting his side of the issues, either to the court or the jury, he was resourceful, persuasive, and eloquent.

As a political debater he was impetuous and forcible, full of ideas, and never halting for the most beautiful language in which to clothe them. Indeed, his graces and gifts of oratory admirably equipped him for the discussion of public questions and rendered him a valuable champion and dangerous antagonist in the arena of forensic contest.

It was my fortune to oppose him for the Democratic nomination for Congress last year. The contest was a spirited one. It began in April and lasted until the middle of June. We often met in joint debate, and I recall now with sincere pleasure that neither of us ever forgot the courtesies and amenities which always exist between gentlemen, and neither of us did anything which tended to destroy the friendship which subsisted between us.

There were blows received and delivered by each of us, but no wound was inflicted which time would not have quickly healed, and I have no reason to doubt but that the contest closed with each of us possessing the respect and esteem of the other.

Mr. DE GRAFFENREID was a man of more than ordinary personal magnetism. I know of no one in the Congressional district which he represented who had a larger or more devoted personal following. His disposition was affectionate and his manners were gracious, without the semblance of being patronizing, and few were insensible to the influences which fell on all who came "within the charmed circle of his presence."

I saw the body of REESE C. DE GRAFFENREID laid to rest in the beautiful cemetery of the little city of Longview, where he lived and was loved. The houses of business were closed, the schools were suspended, and the sable evidences of grief were everywhere displayed. An immense concourse of people, not only from his own place of residence but from the surrounding counties, drawn from every class and condition of life were there, bringing tokens of affection in the shape of lovely flowers. His friends and neighbors bore cheerful testimony in the shape of brief public addresses to the esteem in which he was held, and the sincere grief which was everywhere manifested was an indubitable evidence of his universal popularity and of the strong hold which he had upon the affections of the people.

One of the most beautiful traits in Mr. DE GRAFFENREID'S character and one which always excited my admiration was his affectionate regard for little children. Providence had not blessed his home with childhood's happy laughter, and he seemed to lavish his love upon the children of others. It was a pleasing spectacle to see this strong and stalwart man with some little child upon his lap going into its childish joys and sports with keenest zest, or endeavoring to soothe its childish troubles with tenderest sympathy.

Mr. Speaker, of his career in this body I leave his colleagues who served with him to speak, and I will conclude my tribute to his memory by saying that he was an accomplished lawyer and eloquent advocate at the bar, an adroit and forceful debater on the hustings, a loyal and unflinching friend, and a devoted and affectionate husband.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the House of Representatives is asked to render its last tribute of respect, of honor, and sorrow to the memory of REESE CALHOUN DE GRAFFENREID, late a member of this House from Texas. To-day his associates on this floor are assembled to place on the everliving annals of this House the record of their respect and admiration for his many manly virtues.

These everliving annals is the casket in which is stored many bright gems of the genius, learning, and eloquence of the departed great men who have been members of this House; they have thus left behind them an undying inheritance for our study, our emulation, our instruction, and our encouragement to renewed efforts to elevate our race and to assist the lowly and humble to a higher plane of life, and, above all, to teach us that there is a life beyond, a life of joy and brightness, if we will but improve and unfold the moral attributes that an All-wise Being has implanted within us, and we will be comforted by this course in after years. What more comforting thought can come to the bereaved wife of our departed friend than the thought that her love, care, and devotion brightened the life of her husband and wisely stimulated his laudable ambition to benefit mankind.

Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege to become a member of this House at the same time as my deceased friend, Mr. DE GRAFFENREID; and coming from the same State, belonging to the same political party, and having graduated from the same law school, we soon became the best of friends. I take the following sketch of our deceased friend's life from the Congressional Directory:

REESE CALHOUN DE GRAFFENREID, Democrat, of Longview, was born in Franklin, Tenn., in the year 1859; attended the academic school of that place until 13 years old, and then went to the University of Tennessee and graduated after taking the four-years' course, at the age of 19; graduated from the Lebanon Law School at the age of 20; a graduate of the Lebanon Law School having the right to practice law before majority, he commenced the law practice immediately at Franklin; removed to Chattanooga, where he practiced law for one year, and then removed to Texas; helped to build the Texas and Pacific Railway, and afterwards was assistant fuel agent and brakeman on that road; in 1883 resumed the practice of his profession at Longview, Tex.; was elected county attorney and resigned two months afterwards; in 1888 was elector on the Democratic ticket; made the race for Congress in 1890 with Hon. C. B. Kilgore and ex-Governor Hubbard as opponents and was beaten; was elected to the Fifty-fifth Congress, and was re-elected to the Fifty-sixth and Fifty-seventh Congresses.

Death, indeed, is no respecter of persons, and is always an unbidden guest. Four times in as many years this unwelcome visitor has, unbidden, entered the ranks of the Texas Congressional delegation, composed of only thirteen members, and Cranford, Burke, SHEPPARD, and DE GRAFFENREID have been called to the other shore. Let us have faith to believe that these, our late Congressional comrades and friends, are not swallowed up in death, but that they now dwell beneath the loving smiles of that Divine Power who gave them life and made them mortal.

When the Mohammedan, at the setting of the sun, kneels down in prayer, his utterances are inaudible, and when we think of our departed comrades as we do to-day, we, too, silently contemplate the time when we also must pass over the dark and shadowy river and rest under the shade of the trees beyond.

Let the wild Texas flowers be their tombstone,
And dewdrops, pure and bright,
Their epitaph, the angels wrote
In the stillness of the night.

We need no slab of pallid marble,
With white and ghostly head,
To tell the wanderers in our Texas vales
The virtues of our dead.

Our friends and colleagues can never more return to the shores of time. Their voices are stilled forever, but let us profit by the influences for good that they have left behind them, so that their noble qualities of mind and heart may not be lost, but may linger with us like the perfume of sweet flowers even when we have long parted from them.

The sudden death of Mr. DE GRAFFENREID was a shock to his constituency and to the House, and a personal bereavement to his family and colleagues. He seemed to have a premonition of approaching death; in one of the last conversations I had with him I congratulated him on his splendid physique and excellent health. He seriously replied, "You will live much longer than I; in fact, I do not think that I shall live long; there is something wrong in here," placing his hand on his heart. We soon parted, and not until I received the telegram telling of his death from heart failure did I fully realize the cause of his gloomy forebodings and great seriousness.

The following essay was written by our deceased friend and printed since his death by Mr. Will L. Sargent, a friend who knew him and honored him for his many manly qualities. This essay more than anything I could say gives us an insight to the inner nature of Mr. DE GRAFFENREID and shows what he himself conceived to be his duty to himself and mankind. He said in part:

Each one must act his part and receive his portion of honor or shame. And it matters not whether we labor in the departments of agriculture, speed our influence in political circles, or exert our energies in scientific researches, we do well to bear in mind that the brightest rewards and highest pleasures which mortals know is a consciousness of duty performed, and that the noblest encomium is the approval of our own conscience. To gain the indorsement of this, the highest impulse of our nature, is to attain the acme of all human greatness.

In order to accomplish this in such a way as to produce the greatest amount of happiness, both to ourselves and to our fellow-men, it is by no means incumbent upon us to attack some favored theory or seek to demolish some doctrine of long and reputable standing; nor is it necessary that we institute and promulgate vain and delusive dogmas, by which the unthinking populace are intoxicated and whirled into giddy dance beyond the influence of the few who investigate with prayer and with the philosophy of reason and morality.

Whether it is ours to command or obey; to walk in the gilded halls and marble palaces of wealth, or to dwell in the peasant's humble cottage, we should ever be ready to lend an ear to that still, small voice which says, "Let your light shine and let not that light be darkness."

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe in empty panegyric at any time, and what I may say upon this solemn occasion is prompted by a sincere purpose to perform a sad duty to one whom I admired for his many manly qualities and his warm friendship. R. C. DE GRAFFENREID was a man of sterling integrity and of unflinching loyalty, both as applied to principles and men. He neither faltered in his convictions nor in his friendship; you would always find him true to both—true as the needle to the pole. His heart was large as the man, and whenever he took you in his confidence and you gave your confidence in return, you could feel sure that your trust was never betrayed.

Impulsive and dashing in his antagonisms, he was yet knightly and generous toward those who crossed his purposes whenever they appealed to his sense of honor and fairness. Never vindictive, though always ready to accept a challenge to open combat, he struck straight from the shoulder and never wore a rusty blade or aimed a foul blow. His nature was manly, candid, and brave; his aims direct, lofty, and pure. Under his rough exterior there beat a heart full of love and kindness, and he would go out of his way to do a friend a favor.

He loved and served faithfully the great people who honored him with their suffrage and was always mindful of the public trust with which they had clothed him in this great legislative assembly. He was patriotic and high minded and thoroughly imbued with love of country and a sense of civic duty; painstaking and untiring in his efforts to serve his constituents and prompt in the discharge of his official duties. In his death the country has lost a faithful servant, his State a noble son, and his many friends a loyal friend, and as we deplore the death of our colleague in this solemn hour, let us invoke the blessings and the protection of a kind Providence to hover over her who is left alone to mourn the loss of a beloved husband.

Mr. BALL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. BURGESS, who has been unavoidably called to his home in Texas, has prepared a eulogy, which I shall ask leave to print in the RECORD. In this connection I will also say that there are a number of gentlemen who desired to deliver eulogies in honor of the memory of both Judge SHEPPARD and Mr. DE GRAFFENREID. I ask general leave that they may be permitted to publish their remarks.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Speaker, in the prime of a splendid manhood REESE CALHOUN DE GRAFFENREID was suddenly called into the great beyond. In life he was my true and loyal friend. And much as I dislike to speak of death, I feel constrained by the deep affection we bore each other to offer my feeble tribute to his memory. His death was pathetic. Comparatively a young man, in full possession of fine mental faculties and an extraordinary physique, far from home and friends, this man, who loved all these so fervently, was suddenly seized by the icy, relentless hand of Death, and without opportunity for a parting hand-grasp from friends, or a single tender word from his dear wife, in a moment he was hurried to "that bourne from which no traveler returns."

The physician summoned to his bedside found his spirit fled beyond the power of earthly medicine into the presence of the Great Physician. It was a distinct, sudden shock to his family, and friends whose name is legion. "De," as he was commonly and familiarly called by his friends, was a lawyer of fine ability, especially strong as a jury lawyer, by reason of his mastery of the facts of his case, his logic and eloquence, and, perhaps more than all, his touch with men. His was a fine brain, rich in native force and quickness. In politics he was known as a fighter who in all matters of principle asked no quarter and gave none. As the great Ingersoll said of the greater Conkling, "He walked the highway of his own will, and he kept the company of his self-respect."

He was an honest man, in whose soul lurked not the shadow of a lie; a patriot whose love of country permeated every fiber of his being; a public servant loyal to every trust; a man of clear convictions, and of that greater trait, the courage of them. In thought and feeling he was democratic in the broadest and best sense; inately a gentleman, not so much by the outward polish of this world, but by the gift of God; one whose tenderness toward all mankind suggests the beautiful lines:

Nature, with a lavish hand,
Sends forth her nobly born,
And laughs the paltry attributes
Of wealth and rank to scorn.
She molds with care a spirit rare,
Half human, half divine,
And cries, exulting, "Who can make
A gentleman like mine?"

All along through life, in private and in public, friends sprang up on every side. Here in this Capitol by his fellow-members he was beloved personally; with all the employees of the House he was popular; and that body of brainy men which constitute the molders of thought largely in this country, the press boys, all liked him. In fact, it may be almost said that friendship was this man's religion and that he worshiped at its shrine with an unfaltering devotion. Loyalty to his friends, whether in prosperity or in adversity, seems to have been the law of his being. He was ever responsive to this law, and few men, if any, were more generous in their friendships than this noble heart who sleeps his last sleep.

He had a heart as true and tender as a woman's; it overflowed with love for children, for the true and beautiful in every avenue of life. In sadness I have uttered these truths about my dead friend. I trust that as the light of a quenched star comes down to us for years after it is extinguished, so may the memory of his noble heart linger in sweetness forever in the hearts of his friends.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I now ask that the three series of pending resolutions be adopted.

The question being taken, the resolutions were unanimously adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (at 2 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.). In obedience to the resolutions just adopted, the House stands adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

CONDITIONS IN ISLAND OF GUAM.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed:

To the Senate:

In response to the resolution of January 15, I transmit the attached letter from the Acting Secretary of the Navy, with inclosures, which contain fully and specifically the information asked for.

In reference to the case of Mabini, especial attention is drawn to the communications of the Secretary of War, notably his communication to the Department of the Navy of July 18, 1902; the special dispatch of July 18 from the War Department to General Chaffee, commanding the Division of the Philippines, and to the communication of the Acting Secretary of the Navy of July 26 to the governor of Guam inclosing said letter from the Secretary of War and directing that action in accordance therewith be taken.

By these letters the governor of Guam is explicitly directed to release from detention all prisoners, and it is presumed that he has acted accordingly; but to provide against the slightest chance of misapprehension he has been specifically directed that all persons found in the island under the direction of the War Department shall be released in accordance with the terms of the Secretary of War's letter of July 18. In other words, the inhabitant of the Philippine Islands named Mabini, concerning whom a special inquiry is made in the resolution of the Senate, is at liberty to go on a Government transport anywhere outside of the Philippine Islands where such transports touch without taking any oath of allegiance whatsoever, and is allowed to go to any part of the world save the Philippine Islands without taking the oath of allegiance, and he will be allowed to go on any private vessel to the Philippine Islands, but he can not land there save on condition of complying with the act of the Philippine Commission demanding that he take the oath of allegiance. This is also a condition of the proclamation of peace and amnesty.

I think there will be no objection to it, and I shall try to have it passed by unanimous consent.

REPORT ON ALASKAN SALMON FISHERIES.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by the Senator from California [Mr. BARD] on the 23d instant, to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the report of Howard M. Kutchin, special agent of the Treasury Department, on the Salmon Fisheries of Alaska, for 1902, be printed, and that 750 additional copies be printed and bound in paper covers for the use of the Treasury Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution reported by the Senator from New York?

Mr. QUAY. I object for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania objects.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the reports of the Committee on Printing are by special legislation made privileged. They are matters that are needed from day to day for the convenience of members. I hope things have not come to such a pass that reports of this kind can not be received and passed in the morning hour.

The Senator has already confiscated the portion of the Senate's time beyond 2 o'clock. He now seeks to confiscate the portion of the Senate's time from the opening of the session in the morning to the close of the morning hour, so that ruthlessly and piteously the Senate is tied up and can do no routine business.

If the Senator from Pennsylvania insists on his objection, I hope the Senator from New York will move to proceed to the consideration of the resolution, if that is under the rule, because we may as well understand the situation now. If we are not to be permitted to transact the everyday business which is necessary for the conduct of the affairs of the Senate, then the sooner we know it the better.

I myself was chairman of the Committee on Printing for two years, and I never knew an objection of this kind to be made to a report from that committee, because under the Manderson statute it is made privileged.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, there has been a deal of snarling and sneering at the condition of things in the Senate, at the exercise of what is called one-man power, and at interference with business. All sorts of arguments and assaults are made here upon the majority of the Senate, because, Mr. President, there is no Senator upon this floor, as the Senator from Maine understands, who, singly and alone, can affect anything further than I am affecting just now. It is the right of every Senator to object to unanimous consent for the consideration of any measure.

If I were alone in the Senate, attempting to exert my own power as a Senator of the United States and a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania, the Senator from Maine, with his coadjutors, could brush me out of the way as he would brush a mosquito from his cheek. The power that is dominating the Senate is the power of the majority of the Senators. I am but a scimitar in the hands of the majority, simply a hand on the disk of the dial that registers the will of the majority, and I am tired of being lectured and hectored, as has just been done by the Senator from Maine, whenever I proceed to execute its will.

As to the motion to proceed to the consideration of the resolution, I suppose it is not in order. I do not wish to interfere with the public business or with the desires of my friend from New York. All the important public business of the session can be transacted with dispatch if the minority of the Senate will allow the majority to exercise its right and take a vote upon the pending measure, which is the statehood bill.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the objection is not that the majority of the Senate shall not decide what shall be done. The objection is that the Senator himself assumes to represent the majority of the Senate, not only in his bill and the conduct of his bill, but in reference to every other kind of business.

Mr. QUAY. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. HALE. I have no doubt, Mr. President, if this question could be submitted to the Senate, for Senators are reasonable, the Senate would say at once that the rule shall be enforced which has always been observed, that the Committee on Printing has a right to report at any time and to have its communications considered by the Senate. I have no doubt that the Senate, if the Senator from New York should make the motion, would vote that the Senator shall go on and submit his report and that it shall be received and acted upon by the Senate. The trouble is that the Senator from Pennsylvania will let nothing be done. It is not representing the majority of the Senate on his bill, assuming that he has the majority for his bill, but it is stopping all other business. The Senator has no right to assume that he is representing the majority. The Senator will have an opportunity, and the Senate will undoubtedly have an opportunity, of deciding before long whether all other business is to be set aside for this one measure.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. Do I understand that there is any law which makes the reports of the Committee on Printing always in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Nothing beyond custom.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no rule of the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is none.

Mr. HALE. Is there no law?

Mr. LODGE. It is in the statute.

Mr. COCKRELL. And one objection, under the rule of the Senate, prevents the Senate from considering the matter during the day the report is made?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does.

Mr. HALE. I think perhaps the Chair has not examined the Manderson law. The Manderson statute made the reports of the Committee on Printing privileged. They can be made at any time. It is a part not of the rules, but of the Manderson law and of the statutes of the United States.

Mr. QUAY. There is no difficulty, Mr. President——

Mr. COCKRELL. I have seen the law, but I understand the report of a committee can be considered on the day it is made only by unanimous consent. I remember a very important measure which was once reported in the Senate from the Committee on Military Affairs, of which I was a member. It was reported on the last day of the session, and I believe I was the only member of the committee who objected to it. I made an objection, and every power of the Senate was brought to overcome that objection, because it practically killed the bill. I know that the objection prevailed, and it was then held that the Senate could not consider that report on the objection of one Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not familiar with the Manderson law, and has sent for it; but whatever the Manderson law may be, the rule of the Senate provides, as the Senator from Missouri has stated, that a report from a committee must lie over for one day and can be considered only by unanimous consent on the day when it is submitted.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, there is no doubt about that; but that it is privileged I have no doubt under the Manderson law, unless I am very much mistaken in my memory about that statute.

Mr. QUAY. That is as to submitting the report?

Mr. HALE. As to the report.

Mr. QUAY. There is no question about the right of the Senator from New York to submit the report. The question is about the consideration of the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution reported by the Senator from New York will go to the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

BLACKBURN, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate he was receiving at the time of his demise, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER-GENERAL OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. PENROSE submitted the following concurrent resolution; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 2,000 additional copies of the annual report of the Commissioner-General of Immigration for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1902, with illustrations, said copies to be delivered to the Bureau of Immigration for distribution.

PANAMA CANAL AND PANAMA RAILROAD.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate, as a separate document, the papers included in appendices 1 and 2 to a statement of Col. O. H. Ernst, made to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals on June 14, 1900, setting forth certain concessions and laws of Colombia relating to the Panama Canal and the Panama Railroad, which statement was reported to the Senate by said committee on December 12, 1901, on pages 244 to 270, inclusive, of Report No. 1, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session.

2. Resolved, That the treaty between the United States and Colombia, signed on the 22d of January, 1903, and sent to the Senate, be printed in bill form for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama ask for the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MORGAN. I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not know that I object to the resolution, but I think it had better go over, so that we can have time to consider it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over under the rule.

AFFAIRS IN COLOMBIA.

Mr. MORGAN. I submit the following resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator ask that it be considered?

Mr. MORGAN. I ask for its reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the resolution, and read as follows:

Resolved, That the President is requested, if it is not incompatible with the public interests, to inform the Senate as to the alleged full powers of Señor Herran, who signed the treaty with Colombia that was sent to the Senate on the 23d of December, 1902, for ratification, to negotiate and sign the same.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the sentence just read would indicate that this is a matter of executive business.

Mr. MORGAN. Not by any means, Mr. President. It is asking information upon a matter that is not contained in any treaty and can not be contained in any treaty—a statement of the full powers that are alleged in a treaty sent to the Senate. The injunction of secrecy having been removed from the treaty, it is proposed to inquire of the President of the United States what are the full powers as they appear of record, of course, in the Department of State. It is a public document, which we have a right of access to, and any person in the United States has a right of access to it.

Mr. ALDRICH. This is a matter distinctively, it seems to me, connected with the negotiation of a treaty; it is a pure question for the Executive and not for the Senate; and if it is to be considered in the Senate it ought to be considered in executive session.

Mr. MORGAN. Let us have it read and see. There is no reason in the world why it should be considered in executive session. There is nothing executive, secret, or confidential about it. It is a matter of public record in the Department of State.

Mr. President, I should like to have the resolution read at the desk, if I can have it done, so that the Senate may see what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the resolution, as follows:

2. And that he send to the Senate a copy of the powers of the said negotiator.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I raise the question that this matter should be considered in secret session. I move that the doors be closed.

Mr. HALE. I second the Senator's motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms will clear the galleries and close the doors.

The doors were thereupon (at 12 o'clock and 28 minutes p. m.) closed, and the Senate, with closed doors, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Presiding Officer (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair) laid before the Senate the unfinished business at its last adjournment, namely, the bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, the consideration of which was temporarily laid aside by unanimous consent.

Pending the consideration, with closed doors, of the resolution submitted by Mr. MORGAN, the Senate (at 2 o'clock and 28 minutes p. m.) proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after ten minutes spent therein, the doors were reopened.

SENATOR FROM SOUTH DAKOTA.

Mr. GAMBLE presented the credentials of A. B. KITTREDGE, chosen by the legislature of the State of South Dakota a Senator from that State for the unexpired portion of the term ending March 3, 1903; which were read, and ordered to be filed.

Mr. GAMBLE. I ask that the oath of office may be administered to my colleague.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator-elect will present himself at the desk, and the Chair will administer the oath of office.

Mr. KITTREDGE was escorted to the Vice-President's desk by Mr. GAMBLE, and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

Mr. GAMBLE presented the credentials of A. B. KITTREDGE, chosen by the legislature of the State of South Dakota a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1903; which were read and ordered to be filed.

STATEHOOD BILL.

Mr. BATE. I ask the Senate to proceed with the consideration of the regular order, the statehood bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order, being the bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, is before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment. The bill was laid before the Senate as the regular order at 2 o'clock.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be laid aside temporarily, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of what is known as the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask the Senator from Maine whether he will not permit me to call up a joint resolution, which will take but a minute, which is of considerable importance to the localities in Pennsylvania to which it refers. It is the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 216) extending the provision granting to the State of Pennsylvania the use of the court-house at Scranton and Williamsport, Pa.

Mr. HALE. Not to take any debate?

Mr. PENROSE. There will be no debate about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a joint resolution named by him.

Mr. HALE. I give notice that I can not yield to anything further.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the joint resolution referred to by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] is not before the Senate, but that it is before the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. PENROSE. I was informed that it had been reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will have to ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from its further consideration.

Mr. PENROSE. I was informed that the committee had reported upon the joint resolution. I will not press the request at this time if the committee has not made a report upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not on the Calendar.

Mr. PENROSE. I withdraw my request for the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. BATE. I give notice that I shall object to any other business interfering with the statehood bill but the appropriation bill called up by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The diplomatic and consular appropriation bill is before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 16604) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, which had been reported by the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that it be read for amendment, and that the amendments reported by the Committee on Appropriations be first considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that it be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments be first considered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order will be made.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I merely desire to make a statement, not in connection with this bill. It was my intention to submit some remarks this morning in answer to the very remarkable speech made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] on Saturday last, but that Senator being absent, and as I dislike to even appear to attack his position without his being present, I shall await his return, when I shall discuss the Indianola postoffice matter.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 11, after the word "to," to insert "Austria-Hungary;" and in line 13, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twelve" and insert "fourteen;" so as to make the clause read:

Second secretaries of embassies to Austria-Hungary, Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy, Mexico, and Russia, at $2,000 each, $14,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, after line 13, to strike out:

Second secretary of legation to Austria-Hungary, $1,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 9, to increase the total appropriation for salaries of secretaries of embassies and legations from $78,650 to $82,525.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, after line 6, to insert:

To supply, when needed, diplomatic officers of the United States with recognized and standard works on international and constitutional law and diplomatic history, $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, line 10, before the word "for," to strike out:

Diplomatic and consular act, approved March 22, 1902.

And insert:

Act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, and for prior years, and for other purposes, approved February 14, 1902.

So as to make the clause read:

For improvements of the grounds of the United States legation at Tokyo, Japan, owned by the United States Government, and for the reconstruction of the legation's stable, so much of the sum of $5,700 appropriated by the act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, and for prior years, and for other purposes, approved February 14, 1902, for a new system of heating the legation building at Tokyo, Japan, and for a fireproof vault for the preservation of the records and archives of the legation, as remains unexpended for these purposes and as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, after line 24, to insert:

For payment to Ellen B. Buck, widow of Alfred E. Buck, late minister plenipotentiary to Japan, who died December 4, 1902, while minister, an amount equal to six months' salary of said officer, $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, after line 4, to insert:

For payment to the heirs of Thomas T. Prentis, late United States consul at Martinique, who with his wife and all their possessions were lost in the late disaster caused by the eruption of Mount Pelee, $5,000.

Mr. HOAR. I am afraid the question is not very important, but I desire to ask the Senator from Maine whether the word "heirs" is commonly used instead of "next of kin" with respect to personal property?

Mr. HALE. The heirs are the next of kin. They are the surviving children.

Mr. HOAR. Then it is not worth while to raise the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 15, line 18, to insert:

NEW EDITION OF CONSULAR REGULATIONS.

For preparing and reprinting a new edition of the Consular Regulations, to be expended under the supervision of the Secretary of State, notwithstanding the provisions of sections 1763, 1764, and 1765 of the Revised Statutes, and section 2, act of July 31, 1894, $3,000.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I presume it may not be necessary or important, but I see that this amendment provides for preparing a new edition of the Consular Regulations, notwithstanding some statute that is in force. I wish there were a little explanation of that feature.

Mr. HALE. The money is to be expended, notwithstanding those provisions of the statute.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. What is the provision of the statute which forbids the expenditure now? Why should we repeal that statute in this way?

Mr. HALE. Because the work is to be done by persons already in the Department and drawing salaries.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Oh!

Mr. HALE. It is to piece out.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The statute referred to provides that persons shall have no extra compensation when they already hold office.

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. This is extra work?

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir; extra work. It was put in in order that there may be no secrecy about it and it may be understood.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in Schedule B, under the subhead "Salaries, consular service, consuls-general," on page 16, line 18, before the word "Rome," to insert "Monterey;" and in line 20, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-seven" and insert "thirty;" so as to make the clause read:

The reading of the bill was continued to the end of line 2 on page 19.

Mr. HOAR. I am obliged to go away, and I ask consent to move an amendment.

Mr. HALE. It does not come in strictly until after the reading of the bill has been finished, but as the Senator is called away I shall not object.

Mr. HOAR. It is estimated for. I refer to Fuchau, China.

Mr. HALE. It is in the estimates.

Mr. HOAR. I move, after line 15 on page 17, to insert "Fuchau, China," and if that motion is agreed to, I shall move to strike out the same words in line 6, page 18. The Senator from Maine makes no objection to my moving the amendment at the moment, as I must leave the Chamber. It is regularly estimated for.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 17, after line 15, insert:

Fuchau, China.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. Now, on page 18, I move strike out, after line 5, the words "Fuchau, China."

Mr. HALE. That is right.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I wish to propose a somewhat similar amendment, but I can wait until the reading of the bill is concluded if it is desired.

Mr. HALE. In this case it is done because the Senator from Massachusetts is called from the Chamber. Otherwise individual amendments will come in when the reading of the bill is concluded.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will be resumed.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in class 4, page 19, after line 5, to insert:

The next amendment was, in Schedule C, on page 27, line 13, to increase the total appropriation for the salaries of consuls from $470,000 to $476,500.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will it not be necessary to correct the total, on account of the change made by the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HALE. I ask that the clerks may fix the total.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerks will adjust it, then.

The SECRETARY. In line 12, page 27, it is proposed to strike out "seventy thousand" and insert "seventy-seven thousand;" so as to make the total read "four hundred and seventy-seven thousand dollars."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. On page 16, line 21, I move to strike out the word "Coburg," and to insert it on the same page, line 17, after "Barcelona."

Mr. BERRY. What is the effect of that amendment, Mr. President?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The effect is to increase the salary of the consul-general at Coburg $500.

Mr. BERRY. How much is it now?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It is $2,500. It is estimated for. If the Senator desires, I should like to read what is said in the estimates.

Mr. HALE. I looked the matter up. It is not subject to a point of order, because it is estimated for by the Department, and they state that there is actual need of this increase.

Mr. BERRY. I had no idea of making a point of order, but as I had gone over the bill, being on the subcommittee, and we had the salary fixed at $2,500, I wanted to know if there was a good reason for the change. However, if the Senator from Maine does not object, I shall not interpose. He is familiar with the matter.

Mr. HALE. I do not object to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. There is one other amendment——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will allow the total to be corrected.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The total should be corrected.

The SECRETARY. In line 5, page 17, correct the total so as to read "$44,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. On page 29, line 7, I move to strike out "Naples" and to insert it before the word "Nuremburg," in the first line on page 29. This is an addition of $200 for clerk hire at Naples, an increase from $800 to $1,000. I wish to state that Naples, under our immigration system, is a very important point.

Mr. LODGE. I offer an amendment to come in at the end of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the amendment submitted by Mr. LODGE.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, for the purpose of saving the time of the Senate, I make a point of order against the amendment. It is general legislation.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think the Senator can take me from the floor and not allow me to speak. I have the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no objection to the Senator making a speech.

Mr. LODGE. I have offered the amendment and I have the floor. A point of order can not be made until I have yielded the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the amendment, which was to add to the bill the following additional section:

SEC. —. That the consular system of the United States be reorganized in the manner hereinafter provided in this act, and that the rules and regulations necessary to carry out this reorganization shall be left to the discretion of the President of the United States, except as otherwise provided in this act; and that the plan of reorganization shall be completed and such reorganization begun within the period of one year from the date of its passage.

SEC. —. That the offices of vice-consuls-general, deputy consuls-general, vice-consuls, deputy consuls, and commercial agents shall be filled by appointment, as heretofore, except that whenever, in his judgment, the good of the service requires it, consuls of the fourth, fifth, and sixth classes, provided for in the third section of this act, may be designated by the President to act as vice-consuls-general, deputy consuls-general, vice-consuls, and deputy consuls, and, when so acting, shall be eligible for promotion equally with other consuls of the fourth, fifth, and sixth classes. Vice-consuls may be appointed to perform the functions now performed by consular agents, which grade shall then cease, and such vice-consuls so appointed shall receive as salary an amount equal to the average compensation received by them respectively during the three years next preceding the passage of this act, but in no instance less than $100 per annum. Commercial agents shall be brought into the classification of the service under this act: Provided, however, That nothing in this act shall apply to consular officers holding diplomatic positions.

That there shall be not more than 2 consuls-general of the first class, at $10,000 each per annum; not more than 8 consuls-general of the second class, at $8,000 each per annum; not more than 13 consuls-general of the third class, at $6,000 each per annum; and not more than 13 of the fourth class, at $5,500 each per annum. That there shall be not more than 37 consuls of the first class, at $5,000 each per annum; not more than 35 consuls of the second class, at $4,000 each per annum; not more than 60 consuls of the third class, at $3,000 each per annum; not more than 40 consuls of the fourth class, at $2,500 each per annum; not more than 30 consuls of the fifth class, at $2,000 each per annum; not more than 50 consuls of the sixth class, at $1,800 each per annum.

SEC. — That all fees, official or unofficial, received by any officer in the consular service for services rendered in connection with the duties of his office or as a consular officer, shall be accounted for and paid into the Treasury of the United States, and the sole and only compensation of such officers shall be by salaries fixed by law. And vice-consuls-general, deputy consuls-general, vice-consuls, and deputy consuls shall hereafter receive such compensation as shall be provided for by law, and they shall not be compensated by any portion of the salaries of consuls-general or consuls.

SEC. — That within one year after the date of the passage of this act the President shall classify the consulates-general and the consulates in accordance with the provisions of section 3.

SEC. —. That immediately after the classification required by the foregoing section shall have been made the incumbents of the consulates-general, consulates, and commercial agencies who are included in the provisions of this act then holding office shall be assigned by the President to the various classes as nearly as possible in accord with the compensation they were receiving and the business of the office when said classification was made.

SEC. —. That a consul-general or a consul may be transferred by the President's order from one place to another in the same class, according to the needs of the service, and a consul-general or consul may, in like manner, be assigned to act temporarily in a class above or below that in which he holds his commission, and his salary shall not be affected by such temporary assignment; but no consul-general or consul shall be appointed or transferred to a country in which the United States exercises extraterritorial jurisdiction until he shall have passed an examination in the fundamental principles of the common law, the rules of evidence, and the trial of civil and criminal cases.

SEC. —. That every consular officer of the United States is hereby required (whenever he is applied to or it becomes necessary or proper to do so) at the post, port, place, or within the limits of his consulate, to administer to or take from any person any oath, affirmation, affidavit, or deposition, or to perform any other notarial act which any notary public is required or authorized by law to do within the United States; and for every such notarial act performed he shall charge in each instance the appropriate fee prescribed by the President under section 1745, Revised Statutes.

SEC. —. That every consular officer shall be provided and kept supplied with adhesive official stamps on which shall be printed the equivalent money value of denominations and to amounts to be determined by the Department of State, and shall account quarterly to the Department of State for the use of such stamps and for such of them as shall remain in his hands.

Whenever a consular officer is required or finds it necessary to perform any consular or notarial act he shall prepare and deliver to the party or parties at whose instance such act is performed a suitable and appropriate document as prescribed in the consular regulations and affix thereto and duly cancel an adhesive stamp or stamps of the denomination or denominations equivalent to the fee prescribed for such consular or notarial act, and no such act shall be legally valid within the jurisdiction of the Government of the United States unless such stamp or stamps is or are affixed and canceled.

SEC. —. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the amendment which has just been read, and which was reported favorably from the Committee on Foreign Relations, is a portion of Senate bill 1618, and which stands at the head of the Calendar under Rule IX, "A bill to provide for the reorganization of the consular service of the United States." The amendment is only a small portion of that bill, and I wish, therefore, at the outset, to say a word in regard to the bill itself.

This bill was reported first from the Committee on Foreign Relations by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] in 1895, together with a very able report, in which he considered the needs of the consular service very fully and compared our system with that adopted in other countries. Since that time I have reported the same bill, in substance, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, I think, five times. It has received the steady support of that committee, and I embodied in the report which was made last year the report of the Senator from Alabama in 1895; and that portion of it I shall ask leave to append to what I shall say this afternoon.

I am not one of those, Mr. President, who share in the belief that our consular service is either a bad or an inefficient one. I have no sympathy with the indiscriminate attacks which have been made recently elsewhere upon our consular service; but I am also very far from believing that it is beyond improvement. Always an important service to the business interests of the United States, in the last four or five years, with the very extraordinary growth of our export trade, the consular service has assumed an importance to our business interests which can hardly be overestimated; and the effort which has been made by the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate to make some improvements in the service has originated with and been stimulated by the business men of the country, acting through their chambers of commerce and their boards of trade.

The defects in our consular system are not in the actual personnel at any given time, but in the lack of permanency of tenure, and in the failure to advance the best trained men in the service to the more important posts as they grow in experience and therefore in value.

The value of a consul to the business interests of the United States, other things being equal, is almost in exact proportion to his length of service. A man who goes to a foreign country where another language is spoken, if he is a diligent and ambitious man, eager to succeed, is obliged to consume a large portion of his time at the start in fitting himself for the post which he occupies, and in making it possible to be useful. He has everything to learn. When he has learned the language and customs and business needs of the country and has become a really valuable consul, if there is a change of parties at home, as a rule he goes, and a new man comes in who is obliged to learn the same things all over again before he can become effective.

We have, I think, at present, as a whole, a very excellent consular service. There are undoubtedly some very undesirable consuls, some not fitted for their posts, some who are careless of their duties, and are no credit to the country. There will be a percentage of such consuls in the service under any system that can be devised. There is always, in any service, public or private, a certain percentage of inferior men. That, however, is not the evil the bill was intended to reach, for the bill does not aim at an impossible perfection in human nature, but at a practical improvement of the consular service as a whole.

What I desire to see, and what I believe would be greatly in the interests of the business of the United States, is, so far as possible, to have a body of men as consuls the mass of whom have had some training in the service, who understand foreign languages, and who realize that when they enter the service there is a fair opportunity for regular promotion. Instead of taking an entirely new man and putting him into a post of the highest importance it would be better if he could be put into one of the posts of less importance and some man better trained and of longer experience advanced to the more important place.

It is to meet that difficulty, to bring about that improvement, that this amendment was drawn. The purpose of it is to grade the consuls and in some degree to equalize the salaries.

To-day the salaries of the consuls are simply chaos. At some posts the consuls receive a very large compensation, while at others they are very inadequately paid. The only thing that is ever done in regard to salaries is in the Senate, when individual Senators who know the needs of some particular consulate exert themselves from time to time to get an advance in its pay. The result is that all the salaries of consuls are arranged at haphazard, without much relation to the duties of the office; and if a consulate is properly paid it is largely owing to the fact that there is some member of the House or some Senator who has taken the pains to secure a proper compensation for that particular consulate.

The trouble is still further enhanced by the fact that we retain, in part, at least, the fee system, and the fee system wherever applied in Government business is wasteful. It is not sound economically. It never leads to good results.

In the old days consuls were paid exclusively by fees. That was abandoned or abolished, fixed salaries were substituted, and the consular fees turned into the Treasury. But there were in addition a large amount of fees not strictly consular, generally known as notarial fees, paid for such services as witnessing deeds or other papers to which their signature was necessary and for which they charged a fee to the American citizens who came into their offices requiring such authentication. Some of the consulates receive a large amount of money from those notarial fees; others receive little or nothing. Some of the places at which we have consuls where the notarial fees are of small consequence are posts of great importance, where it is very necessary we should have a consul, where the consul is often called upon to exercise diplomatic functions, and yet, owing to the fact that there are few Americans there, either as travelers or on business, his notarial fees are small, and he receives a salary wholly inadequate for the duties of his post.

Therefore, Mr. President, to my mind the present system presents two very great evils. One is the absence of all grades—that is, of all possibility of regular promotion—and the other is the lack of a proper and systematic arrangement of salaries. I think this condition is against the business interests of the country and tends to cause poor service.

I myself should like to go much further in the reorganization of the consular service than this amendment. I should like to see the service put on an entirely different basis. It is a service, to my mind, in which political appointments are more out of place than probably in any other branch of the Government service. The men appointed to the consulates go out of the country; they can by no possibility take any part in politics; they are separated entirely from political matters here; they are in a foreign country to represent American interests. Their office is one in which there should be no politics of any kind, and it seems to me that of all the branches of the Government service this is the one which more than any other should be put upon a strictly business basis. It is with that view that the Committee on Foreign Relations has year after year reported this bill.

That this bill may not be thought merely the scheme of some doctrinaire or of some one eager for an unreasoning and unreasonable extension of the classified service, I should like to call the attention of the Senate to the names of the gentlemen who appeared before us and to what they represented. The hearing is printed as an appendix to the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations. The first statement was made by Mr. Harry A. Garfield, who represented the Chamber of Commerce of Cleveland, Ohio; the next was by Mr. Gustave Schwab, who represented the Chamber of Commerce of New York; the next was by Mr. John W. Ela, who represented the National Business League; the next was by Mr. W. R. Warner, a large manufacturer; the next was by Mr. S. A. Harris, of Minneapolis, a banker and business man there with large interests; the next was by Mr. Charles P. Moser, who represented the Chamber of Commerce of Auburn, N. Y. These gentlemen were a committee from the national convention of boards of trade of the United States, and they came here as such representatives.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I desire to know whether this national convention of all the boards of trade throughout the country passed a resolution or took affirmative action upon this subject on consular reform, and if these gentlemen came as representatives in pursuance of such formal act by that convention?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Garfield stated that the movement started with the Cleveland Chamber of Commerce. He said:

> All of those things being impressed upon our minds, the Cleveland Chamber of Commerce, along with almost all of the chambers of commerce of the country, in 1898 took part in urging the introduction of a bill for the reorganization of the service.

And those chambers of commerce—not in convention here, but the chambers of commerce throughout the country—sent a committee to represent them. I am giving simply the names of the committee; but they spoke as representing the chambers of commerce throughout the country.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I understood the Senator to say that they represented a convention of the chambers of commerce in our country.

Mr. LODGE. No. I was in error in speaking of a national convention.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I thought that was rather remarkable.

Mr. LODGE. No action was taken in convention. The action was taken by each of the chambers of commerce separately; but they passed resolutions, and those resolutions are in the files of the Foreign Relations Committee. We did not have them printed. Those resolutions represent almost every chamber of commerce in the country in regard to the subject; and this committee came here representing those chambers of commerce. They have been here more than once. The particular hearing which is printed here occurred, I think, two years ago, during the last Congress, but those gentlemen have been here again this year. They have been here every year now for three or four years. They have appeared before the committee of the House of Representatives and also before the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate. Their motive is simply the extension of American commerce and a good consular service. They regard the consular service as an extremely important instrument in seeking and promoting that extension. Their desire is to get a consular service which shall be most efficient in bringing about that result. They desire the passage of the bill which the committee have reported.

That bill provides for a system of examination of candidates for the consular service, for their appointment to the lower grade of consuls, and then for their promotion through the higher grades. It provides also in a general way some of the qualifications which the business men of this country seemed to think were especially necessary for the purpose they had in view. But that bill, Mr. President, as I have already said, once reported by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], and, I think, five times reported by myself, has never made any progress after it reached the Calendar. The committee did not prove to be its grave, but the Calendar did.

This year, Mr. President, it seemed to me desirable to offer an amendment leaving out entirely the feature of examination, to which many of the Senators strongly object, and merely to bring in a proposition for the grading of consuls, for the equalization of salaries, and then with an addition, which is not in the bill, being a provision that stamps should be affixed upon each document receiving the notarial certification of the consul, so that thereby a proper return might be made to the State Department.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. May I make a statement?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I suppose that the Senator has in mind—he says he has—the permanency of the service of our consular officers?

Mr. LODGE. I have.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. And this grading, I suppose, looks to their being promoted from lower grades to higher service. But has the Senator anything in this bill that provides for that?

Mr. LODGE. Nothing. That portion was left out. I attempted only in this amendment to bring forward the very simplest, and, as it seemed to me, the most necessary, improvement to be made—that is, to get a grading of the consuls in classes, with a view to equalizing the salaries and giving an adequate compensation in proper proportion to the duties performed. I think that would have a tendency undoubtedly to encourage promotion, and that when a vacancy occurs in one of the more important consulates the tendency would be to promote the man older in the service and put the new man at a less important consulate. But the amendment requires nothing of that kind.

Mr. PERKINS. I will state, if the Senator please, that that is the present rule introduced by an Executive order of President Cleveland. No one is now eligible for appointment unless he undergoes and passes a satisfactory examination; and consuls are also given precedence for promotion, thus carrying out the very plan proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, which we all indorse so heartily.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from California knows that the order of President Cleveland only applied to pass examinations for persons entering the service. You can not promote in a service where there are no grades; you can have no regular system of promotion without a graded service. In order to have a system of promotion, you must have regular grades. Undoubtedly you can give one man who has got a poor consulate a better one, but no regular promotion.

Pretty much all our civil service is graded, and, in my judgment, wisely so. I think that the consular service would be greatly improved if it could be understood that in case of meritorious service promotion should follow. We have some cases where that has happened. For example, the consul-general at Berlin, who has been in the service many years under both Democratic and Republican Presidents, who distinguished himself very early in his service, has been gradually advanced until he is now consul-general at one of the most important points in Europe, and I think anyone who knows anything about the service will admit that Mr. Mason, at Berlin, is one of the very best consuls in the service of the United States. Setting aside his natural capacity and ability for the moment, there can be no doubt that his long training in different posts has been of the utmost value and has enhanced his worth and the benefit he has been able to give to the business interests of the country.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I dislike to interrupt the Senator, but the subject which is being discussed is one to which I have given considerable thought and investigation, both in reading and otherwise. I am with the Senator upon his proposition, except as to one point, and that is this: I have observed, and I think everybody else has observed, that when a man has been in one place for a length of time his energy gives place to indolence; he gets familiar with the situation, and he rests on his oars. If he feels that he is going to be there for good, his pushing power in the public interest is minimized.

I have always said, and said it not alone upon this subject, that if a law could be provided which would accomplish continuousness of service, and yet which would prevent diminution of interest and energy of the consul, that would be the thing. But the trouble with a measure of this kind has always appeared to me to be that in accomplishing length of service, in achieving experience, a consul destroys his initiative; so that we find when a consul goes to a place with fresh surroundings he goes there full of the peculiar energy and desire to push American commercial interests, and he does so exceedingly well for four or five years. In comparison with the action, for instance, of the English consul at a very important oriental point which I have in my mind, where an English consul has a permanent place, and where, therefore, his energy lags and he gets in the rut of service, the action of the American consul is very marked. Now, what I call the attention of the Senator to is this: How does the Senator propose to prevent the evil which all students of this question see in continuousness of service? I admit fully the virtue of what the Senator has been speaking about, and I have no doubt the Senator will also admit the danger that comes from the circumstances to which I call his attention. But I have not heard the Senator upon that.

Mr. LODGE. I entirely agree with that; and I was coming to that point.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Very well.

Mr. LODGE. I did not mean by what I said on permanency of tenure to imply that we ought to keep a consul in one place indefinitely. I think nothing could be more injurious to the service than that. I should like to see promotion made compulsory. Anything that would tend to compulsory promotion would also tend to facilitate moving consuls from one place to another and would be of vast advantage to the service. To keep a consul in one place all the time results exactly as the Senator from Indiana has described; and that is what happens now in a large number of instances.

If consuls are retained, as a certain proportion of Republicans are retained through a Democratic Administration and Democrats through a Republican Administration, they are retained almost invariably in the places to which they were originally appointed. They stay on year after year and year after year in the same positions until ambition and hope are dead and a dull routine succeeds to energy and activity. One of the prime objects of grading is to get rid of the immobility which now exists in regard to all consuls who are retained for any length of time. It is extremely desirable that some method should be found by which a consul who has shown himself by service at one post to be a good man could be moved to another, because the new post will encourage him to fresh efforts, and I think such a system would keep the service active and alive.

Mr. President, I did not intend with this amendment to solve all the difficulties or all the troubles which exist in the consular service. The bill seeks to do that, and I think very wisely. I am heartily in favor of the bill. This is merely an attempt to get a small improvement; that is all. The purpose of this amendment is only to get the consular service graded, to get the salaries fixed, to abolish fees—all fees—to equalize salaries, to open the door to promotion, so that the Department may have some method of promoting and a better opportunity than it now has.

The amendment is very insufficient—nobody is more aware of it than I am—for the purposes which I think ought to be attained by a comprehensive measure; but I nevertheless think it would be valuable to our business interests. It would not interfere with the appointment of anyone to the consular service by the present undesirable methods. It does not interfere in the least with that. It simply provides that the consuls shall be graded in certain classes; that they shall be paid on a schedule which the amendment proposes, and which has been carefully prepared by the State Department; that fees shall be abolished; that all fees shall be turned into the Treasury, and that the amount of the fees received shall be made as certain as possible by the issuance of stamps which would have to be cancelled or returned.

That last provision about stamps was not in the bill. It is one that was added at the suggestion of the Department. The Department believe that the return of notarial fees is extremely imperfect—whether owing to carelessness or intention it is not necessary to discuss—but they believe that there are large amounts of notarial fees which are not returned. Those fees the consul has the right to keep, but if he fails to return them it at once destroys all accuracy in the knowledge of the Department and the possibility even of their knowing what the consulate is really worth or what the business of the consulate amounts to. If you can get rid of the fees, have them properly returned to the Treasury by the simple system of stamps on all documents to serve as a check, you will get a better return in money from your consulates; you will pay your consuls more accurately and more justly; the men who deserve an increase of salary will get it; and they will all get it instead of an occasional man here and there whom we each of us happen to pick out in the rush of business and get through on an amendment when the appropriation bill comes up.

Mr. President, I have offered this amendment simply as a means of making what I consider a real improvement in the consular service. I am quite aware that the point of order lies against it, but I wished to say what I have said by way of explanation both of the bill and of the amendment and of their purposes. I am sorry that the Committee on Appropriations could not agree with the Committee on Foreign Relations to put it on the bill; but I hope in the future they will see their way to taking steps toward some of these improvements.

I have said all I desire to say on this subject, and I will only ask leave to print as a part of my remarks that portion of the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations which contains the original report of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

The matter referred to is as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1618) to provide for the reorganization of the consular and diplomatic service, submit the following report, as presented at the last session of Congress (Rep. 1202):

The following report was made by Mr. MORGAN on February 6, 1895, to accompany a similar bill when it was reported to the Senate at that time. It covers so many of the essential points in regard to the proposed reorganization that it is here reprinted:

"The consular service of the United States, like that of other nations, developed gradually out of the necessities of commerce and the willingness of merchants in foreign countries to represent other governments than their own, and to discharge certain fiscal and other duties for the sake of the fees to be collected for such services. While the other great commercial nations of the world have at intervals down to recent times been active in the improvement of their consular service, in order to meet satisfactorily the exigencies of a steadily increasing competition in international trade, the consular system of the United States has remained practically unchanged since the time it was called into existence on a small scale by the acts of July 1, 1790, and of April 14, 1792, and kept alive by a number of subsequent unimportant acts.

"The act 'to remodel the diplomatic and consular system' of March 1, 1855, is entitled to be regarded as an improvement only so far as it slightly enlarged the service and corrected certain abuses therein by a closer supervision of the fees. It in no way, however, effected a change in the principle of consular representation or in the system of appointment. Apart, therefore, from the act of June 20, 1864, which provided for the establishment of a small body of 13 consular clerks with a permanent tenure of office, a measure which at its inception was intended to form the nucleus of an entire reform of the service on that basis, this institution, so important to our foreign trade, has suffered the oversight and indifference of Congress.

"This neglect is the more striking and the less excusable when our foreign trade of half a century ago is contrasted with that of to-day. In 1850 the combined value of our imports and domestic exports amounted to $308,409,759; in 1893 it reached the figure of $1,697,431,707. But notwithstanding these present vastly increased and far more intricate commercial relations indicated by these figures, no step whatever to increase the efficiency of the consular service, to which the direction and fostering of these relations are intrusted, has been taken. That this has entailed a great loss annually to our foreign trade can not be questioned; that there is also an urgent necessity to correct this want of efficiency is equally apparent.

"Even more applicable to the industrial and commercial conditions of to-day, but with reference to those of a decade ago, Secretary Frelinghuysen said in 1884:

"'Until recently the demands of Europe, which consumed the greater portion of our exports, and the condition of the producing countries were such as to give us control in the supply of certain products, such as breadstuffs, provisions, cotton, petroleum, etc. The demands of Europe for all these products, and of the other continents for petroleum especially, were so positive and our producing conditions so favorable as to give us practically a monopoly for their supply.

"'These conditions of international demand and supply are undergoing radical changes, which the near future will intensify.

"'The efforts which have been made and which are being made by Europe to enlarge the field of supply in the above-mentioned products, aided by the ambition which prevails in all countries for the development of natural and artificial resources to meet their own wants and to supply the wants of others, have resulted in awakening competition for the supply even of those products which we have heretofore controlled. It is true that thus far this competition has not affected our trade to any appreciable extent, but the desire for development which is now abroad and the ambition which prevails to increase the production (outside of the United States) of the foregoing articles render consular supervision of absolute importance. The complex commercial relations and industrial interests which now prevail in Europe have originated hostility to American products in many countries, and afford additional reasons for the enlargement and perfection of the consular service.'a

"In 1888 Mr. Cleveland, in his message to Congress, expresses himself to the same effect when he says: 'The reorganization of the consular service is a matter of serious importance to our national interests,' and in 1893 he again refers to the subject as follows:

"'During my former Administration I took occasion to recommend a recast of the laws relating to the consular service, in order that it might become a more efficient agency in the promotion of the interests it was intended to subserve. The duties and powers of consuls have been expanded with the growing requirements of our foreign trade. Discharging important duties affecting our commerce and American citizens abroad, and in certain countries exercising judicial functions, these officers should be men of character, intelligence, and ability.'

"In addition to these expressions from a high official source, the necessity of a reform has been recognized by men of letters, eminent statesmen, journalists, and important boards of trade of this country.

"It must be admitted that the present management of our foreign service is burdened with many drawbacks to its efficacy by considerations that relate to domestic politics. Partisan policy, when strictly carried out in making appointments in our foreign service, has no other meaning than that the consular offices are primarily regarded as rewards for political services. The real capacity and usefulness of a consul is too often a secondary consideration.

"This important and indispensable part of the machinery by which our foreign intercourse is conducted is often employed to pension political favorites. That to subserve the interests of the service ought to be the sole end in view in the selection of incumbents can not be disputed. To consider the offices merely as sources from which these partisan officeholders may derive four years of maintenance is as absurd as it would be to construct a navy to defend the country and to intrust its command to landsmen without experience for whom we might desire to provide a living and comfortable quarters.

"Such a purpose, or one not more gratifying, has often been put into practice in our diplomatic and consular service. To protect and promote in time of peace our varied foreign interests through the agency of a trained personnel is not a less important subject for legislative consideration and provision than in time of war to defend them by the most efficient means at our command.

"The object of this act is to provide a system by which persons shall be trained for the duties of the consular service, so that they shall be able to perform them in the best possible way at a reasonable expense to the Government. That this can not be obtained without removing the selection of persons for this service from the control of party politics is shown by our experience, if any proof were required to establish a conclusion so entirely true and indisputable.

"Fitness of the candidate, permanency of tenure during good behavior, and an impartial method of selection and to govern promotion as reward for efficiency are the principles on which a useful consular service can alone be based with an expectation of the best results.

"Under our present system a consular or diplomatic officer has no sooner familiarized himself with the duties of his office and begun to acquire a knowledge of its business and fitness for his duties than he is removed to make room for another novice, who is likewise superseded as soon as his experience begins to enable him to discharge the duties of his office to the satisfaction of himself and others. Thus, in one generation the same post is frequently filled by a number of men, who are successively displaced as soon as they have learned to transact the business of their offices with something of professional knowledge and skill.

"This system is not only unjust to the people, but it is equally unjust to the agents, who are thrown back upon their own resources just at the time when a three or four years' preparation has fitted them to devote their energies and capacity with advantage to the foreign service.

"To compete successfully with the agents of foreign powers, and to conduct advantageously the political and commercial affairs of our own country, the appointee to this service should be familiar not only with the laws, customs, industries, manufactures, and natural products of our own land, but they should be instructed in the laws, pursuits, language, the contributions to commerce, and the character of the people to whom they are accredited. To this should be added a competent knowledge of the law of nations and of commercial law. As long as these officers are transferred from pursuits and associations which have no connection with commerce or the foreign service, however able and skillful they may be in other things, they can not possess the special knowledge and skill which will render their labors either useful or creditable to the consular service.

"The foreign service of European governments for many years has been the object of careful solicitude on their part. An outline statement of them will better enable us to understand the disadvantage we suffer from a defective system.

"The French consular service is composed of—

40 consuls-general, at a salary each	$3,600
50 consuls of the first class, each	2,800
80 consuls of the second class, each	2,000
100 vice-consuls	1,400
24 pupil consuls	800

"The conditions for admission to the diplomatic and consular service of France are prescribed in a decree of October 15, 1892, and, to show how important France considers its foreign service, attention is called to the fact that over thirty decrees have been issued since 1880 tending to perfect the system.

"The pupil consuls are appointed by the minister of foreign affairs. They can only be drawn from the body of attachés on probation who have passed a competitive examination for admission into the service and who have served not less than one year in the home office.

"Before being assigned to a diplomatic or consular post they are required to spend at least one year at one of the principal chambers of commerce, where they are to acquire a thorough knowledge of the methods and needs of commerce, and whence they must send the minister periodical reports on the trade of the district. After three years of service, half of which time must be rendered abroad, the pupil consul becomes eligible for vice-consul, and after a service of three years in each subsequent grade he becomes eligible for promotion to a higher one.

"Candidates for admission in the French diplomatic and consular service must be under 27 years of age and must have taken a collegiate degree in law, science, or letters, or must have passed certain other examinations, or be the holders of commissions in the army or navy.

"The examination for entrance into the service is either written or oral, as may be required.

"The written test consists of a composition on public and private international law and a translation into French from English and German, which is dictated. Those candidates who aspire to the diplomatic career are to write also a composition on a subject of diplomatic history that occurred since 1648; those destined for the consular service must write a composition on a subject of political economy or of political and commercial geography.

"Those whose papers are sufficiently creditable in the opinion of the examiners to warrant their going any further are then subjected to a public oral examination on public and private international law, political and commercial geography, political economy, and a conversation in English and German. Candidates for the diplomatic career are further examined orally in diplomatic history since 1648, and candidates for the consular service are examined on maritime and customs laws.

"The French foreign service is under very strict discipline, and for misconduct or inefficiency there are the following penalties:

"(1) Reprimand.

"(2) Withholding a part of the salary, not exceeding one-half thereof and not for a longer period than two months.

"(3) Suspension from the service without salary for two or more years.

"(4) Dismissal.

"The last three penalties are imposed by the minister of foreign affairs, with the consent of the council of directors, and after a written or oral hearing of the party under censure.

"In addition to their regular salaries, the French consular officers are entitled to traveling expenses and allowances for house and office rent, and for entertaining where it is necessary.

"Such a course of training and discipline must produce thorough efficiency; and the generous rewards given for faithful and profitable service must encourage a good class of men to adopt such employment as a profession to which all their energies and abilities are industriously devoted. The permanency of employment, during good behavior, gives confidence to the officer, and constantly increasing benefit to the Government.

"The British system of regulations for the admission of applicants to the consular service are as follows:

"'Persons selected for the consular service, whenever the circumstance of their being resident in England, on their first appointment, or of their passing through England on their way to take up such first appointment, may admit of their being subject to examination, will be expected to satisfy the civil-service commissioners—

"'(1) That they have a correct knowledge of the English language, so as to be able to express themselves clearly and correctly in writing.

"'(2) That they can write and speak French correctly and fluently.

"'(3) That they have a sufficient knowledge of the current language, as far as commerce is concerned, of the port at which they are appointed to reside, to enable them to communicate directly with the authorities and natives of the place; a knowledge of the German language being taken to meet this requirement for ports in northern Europe; of the Spanish or Portuguese language, as may be determined by the secretary of state, for ports in Spain, Portugal, Morocco, and South or Central America; and of the Italian language for ports in Italy, Greece, Turkey, Egypt, and on the Black Sea or Mediterranean, except those in Morocco or Spain.

"'(4) A sufficient knowledge of British mercantile and commercial law to enable them to deal with questions arising between British shipowners, shipmasters, and seamen. As regards this head of examination, candidates must be prepared to be examined in Smith's Compendium of Mercantile Law.

"'(5) A sufficient knowledge of arithmetic for the nature of the duties which consuls are required to perform in drawing up commercial tables and reports. As regards this head of examination, candidates must be prepared to be examined in Bishop Colenso's Arithmetic.

"'Moreover, all persons on their first nomination to consulships, and after having passed their examination before the civil service commissioners, will be required, as far as practicable, to attend for at least three months in the foreign office, in order that they may become acquainted with the forms of business as carried on there.

"'Limit of age for candidates, 25 and 50, both years inclusive.'" (Fee for examination, £1 to £6.)

"'Mr. Henry White, formerly secretary of legation at London, in an article contributed to the North American Review, makes the following instructive statements concerning the British consular service:

"'The British service was established in its present form by act of Parliament in 1825 (6 Geo. IV, cap. 87). Up to that time its members had been appointed, on no regular system, by the King, and were paid from his civil list. This act placed the service under the foreign office, and provided for its payment out of funds to be voted by Parliament. Since then it has been the subject of periodical investigation by royal commissions and Parliamentary committees, with a view to the improvement of its efficiency. The evidence taken on these occasions is published in voluminous blue books, the perusal of which I recommend to those interested in the reform in our service.

"'Appointments are made by the secretary of state for foreign affairs. Candidates must be recommended by some one known to him, and their names and qualifications are thereupon entered on a list, from which he selects a name when a vacancy occurs. The candidate selected, whose age must be between 25 and 50, is then required to pass an examination before the civil-service commissioners.

"'The salaries of British consular officers are fixed, under the act of Parliament of July 21, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict., cap. 36), by the secretary of state, with the approval of the treasury, and no increase can be made in any salary without the approval of the latter. They average about £600 ($3,000) a year, but, of course, some of the important posts are much more highly paid, the salary of the counsul-general at New York being £2,000 (nearly $10,000), with an office allowance besides of £1,600, and a staff consisting of a consul at £600, and two vice-consuls at £400 and £250, respectively; that of the consul at San Francisco, £1,200 (nearly $6,000), with an office allowance of £600 besides a Communication of the Secretary of State to the President, March 20, 1884.

"'British consular officials are retired at the age of 70 with a pension.

"'There is also an unpaid branch of the service, consisting chiefly of vice-consuls, appointed at places which are not of sufficient importance to merit a paid official. They are usually British merchants, but may be foreigners. They are not subjected to an examination, and are rarely promoted to a paid appointment.

"'Consular clerks are required to pass an examination in handwriting and orthography, arithmetic, and one foreign language (speaking, translating, and copying).'

"Mr. White through a series of years was our secretary of legation at London, and is thoroughly informed on the subject of consular duties and the acquirements that are essential to an efficient and respectable service. His approval of the plan adopted in this bill for the reformation of our consular system and service is a strong recommendation of its future advantages.

"In Germany persons are appointed to the office of consular chancellor who have passed their examinations as 'referendary,' a title which requires graduation at a German university, and requires a thorough knowledge of law, political science, statistics, etc. The chancellor of the consulate is promoted gradually until he reaches the rank of consul-general.

"As a rule, the personnel of our consular establishment is not in unfavorable contrast with that of the leading European States as to intelligence and sagacity; but our consuls have not usually the liberal education characteristic of the consular representatives of the great European States, nor are they so well informed as to commerce and its great variety of contibutory pursuits, or with the exact business methods employed in conducting the commerce of the leading nations. This seems to be our point of most serious deficiency.

"It is proper, and may be necessary, that the laws should designate the places at which consulates are established, but discretion should be given to the President to send consuls to other places, at least temporarily, to meet the demands of trade and intercourse that may arise in new and unexpected quarters. Especially is this necessary in cases where other countries are engaged in war, and a sudden emergency calls for the protection of our citizens in places which are not designated by law as the location of consular establishments.

"But the laws should not designate the individual who is to be the consul at any particular locality. That matter should be left to the discretion of the President, so that he can at all times have the right man at the right place, to meet any demand of trade, or to secure the adequate protection of the persons and property of our citizens in any emergency, or for any public reason.

"The arrangement of fixed residences of the consuls of the several classes is not attempted in this bill. The laws and the practice of the Department of State are, for the present at least, a sufficient guide in that matter.

"The President should, however, be left free in his authority to send a consul of any class to any consulate when he may consider that the demands of the public service require such transfers.

"The reasons for such a provision of law are many and cogent, and they are so obvious as not to require any elaboration in this report. They relate as well to the fitness of consular officers for the particular duties of the occasion as to their usefulness because of their experience as to the condition of the people, the trade, and the language of the particular locality where their services are required.

"The consular establishments thus mobilized would soon show a great growth in the useful knowledge of the affairs of various parts of foreign countries, and our trade with many foreign countries would be greatly increased and rendered more secure.

"The following statements, showing the present condition of our consular service, will show that the change in the organization of the system will add materially to the revenue derived from that source, without a material increase of the expenditures:

Expenditures for salaries of consular officers and amount of compensation in fees, where the officer has no salary, for the year 1894.

26	consuls-general (not including those also commissioned ministers resident)	$98,000.00
188	salaried consuls	371,500.00
11	salaried commercial agents	22,000.00
13	salaried consular clerks	15,000.00
62	feed consuls (personal perquisites in official fees)	36,152.85
33	feed commercial agents (personal perquisites in official fees)	35,505.53
	Notarial and unofficial fees retained by consular officers as personal perquisites (lowest estimate)	250,000.00
333	Total	829,158.38

Officers of the diplomatic service embraced in this bill.

6	secretaries of embassy	$13,875.00
17	secretaries of legation	31,975.00
23	Total	45,850.00

According to the annual report of the Fifth Auditor of the Treasury for the year ended June 30, 1894—

The expenses for last year of the consular service were	$1,055,417.43
The consular fees received for official services were	758,410.81
Excess of expenditures over receipts	297,006.62

"This excess of expenses is larger than it has been for ten years. In 1893 it only amounted to $96,042. The difference is not due to an increase of expenditures, but, no doubt, may be found to a great extent in the changes of our tariff laws. This excess, though larger than customary, is, after all, a small sum when considered with reference to the important purposes for which it is disbursed, and, with the payment into the Treasury of the unofficial fees, as proposed under this bill, it is likely to be greatly reduced, if not changed into a balance in favor of the income from that source.

"The entire excess of expenditures for salaries in the Department of State and in the diplomatic and consular service over the receipts amounts to only $615,909.19, the smallest amount expended by any of the great powers of the world. The expenditures of the foreign service of Great Britain, Russia, Germany, Italy, and Spain exceed this amount by very considerable figures, and the report of the ministry of foreign affairs of France for the year 1893 shows only $240,000 receipts and $3,266,960 expenditures, a sum almost double that expended by the United States, including even the incidental and contingent expenses of the consular and diplomatic service of the latter country.

"This bill adopts the principle of permanent official tenure, so far as the laws can control that subject, but permanent only as it is of benefit to the service. It leaves the power of removal from office to the discretion of the President. The position of each employee of the service is protected against the uncertain and demoralizing effects of changes for merely political reasons in the administration of the Government as far as Congress can control the subject. But this protection is as necessary in practice for efficient work as it is just in theory, and if the plan is adopted of appointing consuls after they are found to be qualified for the respective classifications of the consular service they will seldom, if ever, be dropped from the service for the purpose of supplying their places with political favorites.

"The required examination for appointment and promotion creates an impediment in the way of those who may demand office as a reward for political partisanship, without having adequate knowledge of the duties of this peculiar branch of the public service.

"Each consul must, on frequent occasions, be the judge of his proper line of action without aid or direction from the minister to whom he is required to report or from the Department of State. In such cases it is requisite to the honor and security of the Government that the consul should be well informed as to his duties.

"The right of the President to select from the whole body of consuls any man for any place he may prefer, and to assign him to such place for duty, and to transfer him at pleasure to another place, is the full equivalent of the power of appointment to a particular office.

"These functions are to be exercised in foreign countries, for the most part distant from the United States, and disconnect the incumbents from participation in our home politics.

"In so far as they may be given as rewards for party services, they are a sort of pension system for men who have not been successful in getting offices at home, or who have failed of success in the usual channels of business.

"The consular system should be based upon the plan of personal qualification for its important and pecular duties, ascertained by the examination and experience of those employed in it, rather than upon the plan of selecting those for this service who have failed in other pursuits, or those who desire to go abroad for purposes of travel, recreation, or amusement.

"This is the only branch of the public service that has been used, to any great extent, for the gratification of the incumbents, without regard to their capacity to render efficient service to the country, and it is time that our policy in respect of these offices was changed.

"Taken in the aggregate, there is no class of representatives of our Government who can so seriously affect our commerce with other countries, in their actual and direct conduct and dealings, as our consuls and commercial agents.

"We should encourage our best classes of people to qualify themselves for this important service by giving them just compensation for their work and by securing them in these offices during good behavior.

"They have much to do with the dignity of our Government, its credit in foreign lands, the honor of its flag, and the safety of its citizens."

Since Mr. Morgan made the report which has just been given, the need for a reorganization of the consular service has become more apparent with each succeeding year. This is particularly true of the last two years, which have witnessed such an enormous increase in American exports, this increase occurring chiefly in manufactured articles of the most varied kind. The development of our industrial system has reached a point where its production is far in excess of the demands of the home market, and the expansion of our export trade is the result of the necessity of finding consumption for our surplus production. It is clearly in the interest of our industry and commerce that everything which the Government can do to facilitate this expansion of our export trade should be done, and no argument is needed to show that the consular service ought to be a most efficient instrument in promoting American exports and in aiding our industry and commerce to find new markets.

No one who has examined this question can fail to be convinced that we might and ought to obtain a much higher degree of efficiency in our consular service in these directions than is now the case. The chief trouble lies not in the character or ability of our consuls, but in the defective system under which they are appointed. A consul, as a rule, is most valuable to our business interests in proportion to his experience in the consular service, yet under the existing system experience is no guaranty for retention in the service, and when a man has attained experience the time has usually been reached for his removal, on account of a political change at Washington, and for replacing him with an inexperienced man who has the entire lesson to learn afresh from the beginning.

The bill reported from the committee aims to correct this evil by assuring a greater permanency of tenure, promotion for good service, and original appointments to the lowest grade of consulates of men whose fitness for the service has been, in a measure, tested by examination. The work of examining candidates is intrusted by the bill to a board composed of officers of the State Department and of the consular service to whom the requirements of that service are most familiar.

The bill also makes an important and much-needed change by abolishing all fees, wherever practicable, and giving to the consuls a proper salary. If all fees are turned into the Treasury of the United States it is believed that, despite the increase of salaries carried by the bill, the service will be practically self-supporting, certainly more nearly so than it is now, and that thus a better system will not only be obtained, but there will be a direct saving to the Government.

The bill also simplifies the present organization by bringing all commercial agents who are citizens of the United States into the regular service. It further requires that all persons now in the service shall be recalled and examined for reappointment in such manner as the board may prescribe; their record, to which great weight will be given, of course, will be examined at the same time. This provision, the committee believe, will lead to a marked improvement in the general character of the service, and will put all members of the service under the reorganization on the same plane.

The consular clerks, who must not be confounded with the clerks employed in consulates, but who now form a body of officers established by law, and who are sent out in various exigencies to take temporary charge of consulates, are, by this bill, to be graded as consuls and brought within the scheme of reorganization.

The committee have aimed to make the scheme of reorganization as simple as possible, and to seek only to give to the consular service a greater permanency of tenure and a higher degree of efficiency. Your committee believe that the consular service, reorganized as is proposed by this bill, will be of very great service to the business interests of the country and in advancing the development of our export trade. The industry and commerce of the United States have a right to demand the best consular system which the Government can provide. It is difficult to estimate the importance to our business interests of the information which an energetic and thoroughly organized consular service could furnish them. Many large firms and corporations now maintain agents in all parts of the world to gather this information for them, but smaller firms and corporations, unable to go to this expense, are put at a disadvantage, because the consular service fails to give them what they have a right to expect. Representatives of chambers of commerce and of other commercial bodies from all over the country appeared before your committee to urge the passage of this bill. The attention of the Senate is especially invited to the statements made by these gentlemen which are appended to this report.

Your committee feel that, in response to the demand of our business men and as a potent means of promoting our export trade, the legislation embodied in this bill should receive prompt action at the hands of Congress.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I think the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] did not withdraw his point of order, but refrained from pushing it so that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] might submit his remarks to the Senate. I only wish to say that the Committee on Appropriations, having charge of the bill, did not think it a good thing now upon this bill to enter upon this large subject of the complete revision of the consular force. Therefore nothing has been done by the committee, and the amendment is clearly, as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts himself, subject to the point of order raised by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I was engaged in conversation with a Senator at the time when the point of order was made, and so I did not hear it and do not now know what its condition is before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not before the Senate at all.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It is not to be voted upon?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not, unless there is an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I assure the Chair that I cherish not even an embryonic purpose of that kind.

This is a subject in which for many years I have been profoundly interested, and on which I have experienced two or three changes of opinion, brought about by investigation of a great many score of consuls in various countries; and while I shall be very apt to follow the Senator from Massachusetts in any measure of this kind, which might meet his final and mature judgment—because he has perhaps given it more study than any other Senator who is now a member of this body—there are certain points as to which I would feel impelled at the time I did support him to explain myself upon. But if the amendment is not now before the Senate, of course, I do not care to take the Senate's time in presenting those points of divergent view with the Senator from Massachusetts. I might merely mention them for a minute or two minutes before I sit down, and call the attention of the Senator to the fact, as I did in my question, that one of the great evils recognized in the diplomatic and consular service of other countries is that failure of energy, what the English call "the dry rot" of their consular service; and which all are agreed is brought about by a certainty of official tenure and length of official service. That would have to be remedied in some way in any sort of a method of consular reform.

It is also true, Mr. President, that the preparation of our men is not so bad as those who have become enthusiasts upon the subject of consular reform have led themselves to believe. Our men go over there fresh from American business and political life. It is a training which, while not perhaps the best for this special purpose, nevertheless sharpens a man's wits and stimulates his energy. Witness the tribute paid to the American consular service by the German Government. It will be found in the report of the German Imperial commission upon the consular services of the world, quoted in a book issued by the consular bureau of our State Department. It is the highest practical tribute, a tribute that has not been paid to the consular service of any other nation in the world. It even goes on in perhaps the language of extravagant eulogy to say that our consuls all over Europe are the unrivaled sentinels of American enterprise and commerce. Therefore it will not do to say that simply because our men are picked up fresh from American business life they are thereby unfitted for these great duties.

I had intended, in case this amendment was before the Senate, as I find it is not, to speak at very limited length upon the comparative value of the German consular service, the English consular service, and the American consular service, which perhaps affords three of the best types of the different consular systems in the world; but, of course, Mr. President, if the point of order has been made to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts I shall not do so.

I want merely to say before I conclude that I am in most hearty sympathy with any reform of the consular service which will eliminate certain evils that are patent to every one, but it must at the same time prevent those evils which have accompanied a life tenure and a certainty of service in other systems, and which have made the English themselves very bitterly criticise their own consular service throughout the world. It has even been said on one or two occasions that the decline of British commerce in certain portions of the world has been due to the indifference of their consuls.

Of course I shall not address the Senate upon this subject now, although I thought the amendment was before the Senate, but I merely wanted to suggest these two or three points of difference, saying at the same time that I should support the measure of the Senator from Massachusetts, and likely any other measure that might meet the final and mature judgment of the Senator from Massachusetts upon this question, because I am earnestly in favor of some renovation of the consular service; but at the same time it has its virtues, which must be preserved.

Mr. GALLINGER. I had intended, Mr. President, to address myself for a few minutes to the amendment which has been ruled out, and I presume I could, under the elastic rules of this body, do so now without reference to whether anything is pending or not, but I will not do so. I recall the earnest lecture that we received this morning from the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], in which he notified the country that the majority of this Senate was filibustering—something that I never heard suggested in a legislative body before in my life and never expect to hear suggested again. In addition to that, I am extremely anxious to hear the concluding chapters of the very interesting and able speech that my colleague [Mr. BURNHAM] is delivering. For those two reasons I shall take but a moment's time of the Senate.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Do I understand that the Senator engages to listen patiently to the concluding chapters of his colleague's address?

Mr. FORAKER. I call for the regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. GALLINGER. This is the regular order. I am the regular order just now.

Mr. FORAKER. I beg pardon. I thought the Senator from New Hampshire had concluded.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No; I asked the Senator from New Hampshire a question.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Indiana has been propounding questions that have had no relation whatever to the question before the Senate for the last two weeks; and we all understand his purpose. I will answer any reasonable question that the Senator can propound at any time, and will take pleasure in doing so.

I was merely about to say, Mr. President, that I do not propose to take the time of the Senate. I want the public business to proceed as expeditiously as possible, and certainly I shall not put myself in an attitude at any time to prevent it, desiring, as I do, that the majority of this Senate shall control the business of the Senate in a proper way under the rules of this body.

I will content myself, Mr. President, on this question of consular reform by asking permission to introduce into my remarks a very brief editorial from a recent issue of the New York Sun, which discusses this matter and which calls attention to what Mr. Frederic Emory, Chief of the Bureau of Foreign Commerce, has said as to the value of our consular service and the most excellent work that our consuls are doing in all parts of the world.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the article will be published in the RECORD.

The article referred to is as follows:

OUR USEFUL CONSULS—THEY ARE HUSTLING FOR AMERICAN TRADE IN ALL PARTS OF THE WORLD.

Poorly paid as it is and inadequately supported, the American consular service is more efficient to-day than that of any other country. The Germans have paid us the compliment of saying that it is a corps of spies engaged in learning jealously guarded trade secrets, and from England tributes come which are more temperate but equally flattering.

In a report which has just been issued, Mr. Frederic Emory, Chief of the Bureau of Foreign Commerce, says that whatever may be the defects of the present service, it is showing itself alert and responsive to new conditions. "A most gratifying evidence," he says, "of the increasing value of the consular reports, of which there are now five classes—annually, quarterly, monthly, special, and daily—is found in the widespread demand for them on the part of colleges and schools as reference books in special courses of commercial instruction. This demand has grown up within the past few years, and in itself is symptomatic of the spread of popular interest in foreign trade. In addition to the published reports, the consuls of late, by means of correspondence conducted under the supervision of the Department of State, have supplied a great mass of information to trade bodies and business firms, and in many cases have voluntarily exerted themselves in other ways to promote commercial expansion. Their efforts frequently elicit warm commendation in letters to the Department from the trade interests thus benefited, and even when a consular officer lacks other qualifications it seldom happens that he fails to exhibit the characteristic American spirit in 'hustling' for business, not for himself, but for his country."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further amendment as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FORAKER. I ask that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the statehood bill.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 15922) making an appropriation for the suppression and to prevent the spread of contagious and infectious diseases of live stock, and for other purposes. I think it will take but a few moments.

Mr. FORAKER. I hope the Senator from Wyoming, unless this is something of an emergency measure, will not ask for its present consideration. We have temporarily laid aside the unfinished business now for some two or three hours to accommodate Senators, and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BURNHAM] is about to conclude his speech, as I understand, and I should be very glad to resume at this time the further consideration of that bill, so that he may conclude this afternoon.

Mr. ALDRICH. At this hour in the day it hardly seems worth while to proceed to the consideration of any measure. The Senate has been in session a long time to-day, and I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that we had better adjourn and give the Senator from New Hampshire a chance to go on in the morning.

Mr. GALLINGER. When he is fresh.

Mr. ALDRICH. He will then be fresh.

Mr. FORAKER. I should like to accommodate myself, of course, to the wishes of Senators, but the Senator from New Hampshire has been waiting here patiently now until I am ashamed to look over in his direction even.

Mr. ALDRICH. In order to test the sense of the Senate, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. FORAKER. For four hours he has been impatient to resume his remarks. He has had only four days and I insist that he shall have another day now, and I shall yield to nothing.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island, that the Senate adjourn. [Putting the question.] The "noes" appear to have it.

Mr. FORAKER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was going to announce that the "noes" had it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope we will have a vote by yeas and nays.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I hope the Senator from Ohio will not object to the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 16910) making appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

FANNIE M'HARG.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 6132) granting an increase of pension to Fannie McHarg, which was, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "sixteen" and insert "twelve."

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The amendment was concurred in.

EXHIBIT OF AMERICAN MERCHANDISE AT SHANGHAI, CHINA.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish to give notice that on Tuesday, the 10th day of February, immediately after the routine morning business, I will submit some remarks on the bill (S. 6125) for the erection and maintenance of an exposition building in the city of Shanghai, in the Empire of China, for the appointment of a commissioner in charge thereof, and for other purposes.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota if he has the consent of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] for that purpose?

Mr. MCCUMBER. No; nor the consent of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE], but I assume that they will both grant it.

STATEHOOD BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States is before the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to give notice that at an early day I shall ask the Senate to consider the bill which I have endeavored to call up.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator from Wyoming will allow me to get the unfinished business under way, so far as I have power to do so, I will yield, if the matter is one that will require only a moment and will not precipitate debate.

Mr. HALE. The statehood bill is before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is before the Senate.

SUPPRESSION OF DISEASES OF LIVE STOCK.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to ask the Senator from Ohio to yield to me to call up the bill (H. R. 15922) making an appropriation for the suppression and to prevent the spread of contagious and infectious diseases of live stock, and for other purposes. It will not lead to debate.

Mr. FORAKER. I yield to the Senator upon his assurance that the bill will not provoke any debate, and that it is a short measure. If it does precipitate debate, I will withdraw my consent.

Mr. WARREN. I think it should not provoke any debate, and should it provoke debate of consequence, I shall expect to withdraw it, of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be laid temporarily aside, and that the Senate may proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him. Is there objection?

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the bill may be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. WARREN. I will state that it is proposed to change the title of the bill, so that it will not be an appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with an amendment on page 3, after line 20, to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 3. That any person, company, or corporation knowingly violating the provisions of this act or the orders or regulations made in pursuance thereof shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction shall be punished by a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $1,000, or by imprisonment not more than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to more effectually suppress and prevent the spread of contagious and infectious diseases of live stock, and for other purposes."

STATEHOOD BILL.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BURNHAM] has informed me that it will be inconvenient for him to go on this evening, and that he would greatly perfer to take the floor in the morning. Therefore I withdraw my objection to the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BURTON. May I ask the Senator from Rhode Island to yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the Senator had better get up his bill in the morning.

Mr. BURTON. I can not get it up in the morning.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think I shall have to insist on my motion. I think if the Senator, with his influence, will appeal to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY], it will be all right.

Mr. BURTON. I am afraid some one on the other side will object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 22 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 27, 1903, at 12 o'clock meridian.

POSTMASTER AT INDIANOLA, MISS.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged report from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] calls up a privileged report, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads have had under consideration the resolution No. 398, and beg to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the same pass, with the following amendment:

Strike out all after the word "Mississippi," in line 6.

The clause proposed to be struck out by the committee is as follows:

And to state why, so far as he may know, such resignation has not been accepted and a new appointment made, so that the people of said town may be provided with the privileges of post-office service.

The following is the resolution as proposed to be amended:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be requested to transmit to the House of Representatives, if not inconsistent with the public interest, a copy of all correspondence and other documents in his possession or under his control pertaining to the recent resignation of the postmaster at Indianola, in the State of Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I understand that this is a unanimous report. Am I correct in that?

Mr. LOUD. It is.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I should like to ask a question of the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD].

Mr. LOUD. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I was busy at the moment that this report was read. Does the resolution, as now presented, call upon the President as well as upon the Postmaster-General for correspondence in his hands?

Mr. LOUD. I will state that it does not. It calls upon the Postmaster-General.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Well, Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry: Would it be in order to offer an amendment to the resolution?

Mr. LOUD. I am not disposed to yield for an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California controls the time on the resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I wanted to offer an amendment, if the gentleman would yield for that purpose, calling upon the President, as well as the Postmaster-General, for correspondence in his hands.

Mr. LOUD. I want to state for the information of the gentleman that the committee have arrived at a unanimous report upon this resolution, and we are satisfied that the correspondence in this case is in the hands of the Postmaster-General.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I am informed that there are some communications in the hands of the President, and we should like to have them, in order that light may be fully shed on this question. If the gentleman will yield for that purpose, I will offer an amendment to insert the words "President and" just before the word "Postmaster-General."

Mr. LOUD. I regret to say that I can not yield for that purpose.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Very well.

Mr. SWANSON rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]?

Mr. LOUD. Yes, sir.

Mr. SWANSON. I understand from the gentleman from California that all the correspondence in this case will be sent to the House under this resolution, except, I think, one personal letter, which it is claimed was written to the President, which he claims was a personal letter, and which the public interest would not permit to be sent under the resolution if it had been amended as suggested. That is the reason why an amendment offered by myself in the committee, to insert the word "President," was not pressed. It was upon the assurance that all the papers would be communicated for the consideration of the House——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Except some.

Mr. SWANSON. Except a letter that the President claims is a personal letter, and which he says it would not be compatible with the public interest for him to communicate. That is my understanding, and the reason why we did not insist that an amendment inserting the word "President" should be included. Our understanding was that all the correspondence would be sent in.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was adopted.

On motion of Mr. LOUD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HEMENWAY, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 17046) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. PAYNE. I reserve all points of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York reserves all points of order on the bill.

NATIONAL FLORENCE CRITTENTON MISSION.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 14899) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the National Florence Crittenton Mission.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin, chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, calling up the business of that committee, submits the following bill.

The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act at any time is hereby expressly reserved."

The following amendment, recommended by the Committee on the District of Columbia, was read:

In line 11, page 2, strike out the words "in any court of the United States."

Mr. PEARRE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland who made the report, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. How much time is yielded?

Mr. BABCOCK. As much time as is necessary.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. PEARRE. Mr. Speaker, there are two other amendments made necessary by the death of Wager Swayne, one of the incorporators.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman please send up his amendment? The Clerk will report the amendments offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 8, page 1, strike out "Wager Swayne" and insert "John Joy Edson."
On page 3, line 8, strike out "Wager Swayne" and insert "John Joy Edson."

The amendments were agreed to.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PEARRE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ABATEMENT OF NUISANCES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 13630) to provide for the abatement of nuisances in the District of Columbia by the Commissioners of said District, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever the owner of any real property in the District of Columbia shall fail or refuse, after the service of reasonable notice in the manner hereinafter provided, to correct any condition which exists on or has arisen from such property in violation of law or of any regulation made by authority of law, with the correction of which condition said owner is by law or by said regulation chargeable, or to show cause, sufficient in the judgment of the Commissioners of said District, why he should not be required to correct such condition, then, and in that instance, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may, and they are hereby authorized to, cause such condition to be corrected, to assess the cost of correcting such condition and all expenses incident thereto (including the cost of publication, if any, hereinafter provided for) as a tax against the property on which such condition existed or from which such condition arose, as the case may be; to carry such tax on the regular tax rolls of said District, and to collect such tax in the same manner as general taxes in said District are collected: Provided, That the correction of any condition aforesaid by said Commissioners under authority of this section shall not relieve the owner of the property on which such condition existed, or from which such condition arose, from criminal prosecution and punishment for having caused or allowed such unlawful condition to arise or for having failed or refused to correct the same.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of carrying into effect section 1 of this act the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and all other persons, including contractors and employees of contractors acting under their authority or by their direction, be, and they are hereby, authorized to enter upon and into any lands and tenements in said District, during all reasonable hours, to inspect the same and to do whatever may be necessary to correct, in a good and workmanlike manner, any condition that exists on or has arisen from such lands or tenements in violation of law or of any regulation made by authority of law, with the correction of which condition the owner of said lands or tenements is by law or such regulation chargeable. Any person who shall hinder, interfere with, or prevent any inspection or work authorized by this act shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $100, or by imprisonment for a period not exceeding three months, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 3. That for the purposes of this act any notice required by law or by any regulation aforesaid to be served shall be deemed to have been served (a) if delivered to the person to be notified, or if left with any adult person at the usual residence or place of business of the person to be notified, in the District of Columbia; or, (b) if no such residence or place of business can be found in said District by reasonable search, if left with any adult person at the office of any agent of the person to be notified, which agent has any authority or duty with reference to the land or tenement to which said notice relates; or, (c) if no such office can be found in said District by reasonable search, if forwarded by registered mail to the last known address of the person to be notified and not returned by the post-office authorities; or, (d) if no address be known or can by reasonable diligence be ascertained, or if any notice forwarded as authorized by the preceding clause of this section be returned by the post-office authorities, if published on three consecutive days in a daily newspaper published in the District of Columbia; or, (e) if by reason of an outstanding, unrecorded transfer of title the name of the owner in fact can not be ascertained beyond a reasonable doubt, if served on the owner of record in the manner hereinbefore in this section provided. Any notice required by law or by any regulation aforesaid to be served on a corporation shall for the purposes of this act be deemed to have been served on any such corporation if served on the president, secretary, treasurer, general manager, or any principal officer of such corporation in the manner hereinbefore provided for the service of notices on natural persons holding property in their own right; and, if required to be served on any foreign corporation, if served on any agent of such corporation personally, or if left with any adult person at the usual residence or place of business of such agent in the District of Columbia. Every notice aforesaid shall be in writing or printing, or partly in writing and partly in printing; shall be addressed by name to the person to be notified; shall describe with certainty the character and location of the unlawful condition to be corrected, and shall allow a reasonable time to be specified in said notice within which the person notified may correct such unlawful condition or show cause why he should not be required to do so.

SEC. 4. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. HEPBURN. Does this bill include, among the other nuisances that I suppose are to be abated, that which comes from the refusal of property owners to clear the pavements of deposits of snow?

Mr. BABCOCK. I will say to the gentleman that while I did not report the bill, I do not understand that it deals with the snow and ice question at all.

Mr. HEPBURN. Is there any provision of law in this District that compels the owners of unoccupied lots or of occupied lots to clean from their pavements accumulations of snow?

Mr. BABCOCK. There is a law of that kind, but it has been found to be defective in the notice that is required. The courts have held, I believe, that it is not competent to notify the agent of the property, and there is now pending before the District Committee an amendment to the present law.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Speaker, we can not hear a word that is being said, and nobody over here knows what the bill is, so far as I know. I would like to have the chairman of the committee tell us what this bill is before we are called upon to vote for it.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PEARRE], who reported the bill.

Mr. PEARRE. Mr. Speaker, this bill only changes existing law in two particulars. The first is that instead of relegating the District authorities to a lawsuit against the party failing to remove a nuisance or to abate it under existing law, it imposes the cost upon the property as a tax, and authorizes and permits the tax officers to collect the cost of the removal or abatement of a nuisance as a tax against the property. It furthermore provides a system of notices, which has been found to be necessary by reason of the fact that there has been no remedy and is no remedy under existing law against a nonresident owner.

Existing law provides that a notice shall be given, but it provides no method of notifying a nonresident owner. In the last section of this bill that hiatus, as it were, in the law is supplied by an elaborate system of notices against nonresident owners, notifying them that there is a nuisance being maintained in or upon their property, and warning them to abate that nuisance within a certain reasonable time. If the nuisance be not abated after that notice has been given in the manner prescribed by the pending bill, then the authorities of the District have the right to go upon the property, abate the nuisance, and collect the charges and costs arising from the abatement of that nuisance against the property as other taxes assessed against the property.

Mr. KLEBERG. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. PEARRE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KLEBERG. Is this the unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. PEARRE. It is the unanimous report of the committee. There is no dissension at all. It is recommended by the health officer and the Commissioners of the District. The members of the House will discover that the existing law on this subject is contained on page 303 of the Supplement to the Revised Statutes of the United States, and consists of the legalization of all the ordinances passed by the old District government, this legalization having been made by a resolution approved on the 24th day of April, 1880, in which all things which constitute nuisance or which shall constitute nuisance in the District of Columbia are defined and certain penalties prescribed. The law has been discovered to be defective in the provision referred to in this bill. The report has the unanimous recommendation of the Commissioners and the health officer, and the committee believes that the bill should pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PEARRE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SEWARD PLACE.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up the following bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15799) to confirm the name of Seward place for the space formed by the intersection of C street south and Pennsylvania and North Carolina avenues, District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act the space formed by the intersection of C street south and Pennsylvania and North Carolina avenues, from Fourth to Sixth streets east, in the District of Columbia, now commonly known as "Seward place," shall be officially known and designated "Seward square."

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 8 strike out the word "place" and insert the word "square."
Amend the title so that it will read as follows:
"To confirm the name of Seward square for the space formed by the intersection of C street south and Pennsylvania and North Carolina avenues, District of Columbia."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The amendment to the title was agreed to.

TO CANCEL CERTAIN TAXES ASSESSED AGAINST THE KALL TRACT, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up the following bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16099) to cancel certain taxes assessed against the Kall tract.

Be it enacted, etc., That the award and assessment of benefits of $14,000, made by the jury, and confirmed by the court, against four certain parcels of land known as the Kall tract, which are more particularly described in a certain petition and plat attached thereto, filed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, holding a district court for said District, which proceeding is entitled "In re extension of S, Twenty-second, and Decatur streets, No. 549," be, and the same hereby is, annulled, canceled, and for naught held; and said land and every part thereof is forever released and discharged from the lien created by said assessment, and from the payment of said assessment; and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are directed to strike the same from the tax books.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to hear some explanation of this bill.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, when Congress passed a bill providing for the opening of S, Decatur, and Twenty-second streets NW., in order to make a passage between Connecticut avenue and Massachusetts avenue extended, that bill provided for accepting certain donations of property for the opening of the streets. It provided further that any benefits that might arise by opening these streets should be assessed to abutting property. Now, the facts are, Mr. Speaker, that the owners of the Kall tract, which consisted of about 7 acres, dedicated some 77,000 feet of land. It was valued by the Commissioners at $80,000. They owned the property on both sides of the proposed street.

The owner of the next piece of property refused to donate, and it was condemned and damages assessed; but instead, Mr. Speaker, of assessing the benefits against the property where the party had failed to contribute, it was assessed against all. Consequently these parties, the owners of the Kall tract, dedicated 77,000 feet of land for the opening of the streets, very nearly 2 acres of ground, and in addition to that were assessed $14,000 for benefits. Now, the facts are that the parties that refused to donate were not only paid for their land taken at so much per foot. but were assessed proportionately for benefits. The committee, Mr. Chairman, never contemplated that against this property, where the entire street had been donated, there should be assessed benefits; but in the wisdom of the jury that made the assessment they did so, which was in plain violation of the intent of the law. However, the court has held that the action of the jury was proper, and the owners necessarily come to Congress, which is their last resort, for relief. I would ask, Mr. Speaker, in this connection that the Clerk read the report of the Commissioners of the District, which explains the status fully.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report as a part of the gentleman's remarks:

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, January 15, 1903.

DEAR SIR: The Commissioners of the District of Columbia beg to acknowledge receipt of H. R. bill 16099, entitled "A bill to cancel certain taxes against the Kall tract," and to submit the following views thereon:

In the spring of 1899 the owners of the Kall tract, certain ground adjoining Kalorama Heights and supposed to embrace 9 acres, but afterwards found to contain only 7 acres, generously dedicated 77,925 square feet of ground for public use as streets, or two-sevenths of the entire tract. The owner of the adjoining tract, however, declined to contribute any of his ground for such purpose, and 33,428 feet were condemned. The jury found the value of the land taken from him to be $52,000, and they awarded him that sum in bulk, which is at the rate, on the average, of a little over $1.54 per square foot. Against this sum they levied benefits to the amount of $10,000, leaving the net sum of $42,000 actually paid to him as the result of the condemnation proceedings.

The owners of the Kall tract, on the other hand, were assessed $14,000 in benefits. They could not, of course, be allowed compensation for the land which they had contributed, and so they found themselves in the position of donating over 77,000 square feet of ground, worth at least $80,000, and of being asked to pay $14,000 in addition, or a total of $94,000 in all; while the owner of the property adjoining, who gave nothing, received $42,000 in cash.

The Commissioners submit that the owners of the Kall tract are acting within the bounds of equity in asking the cancellation of the assessment for benefits, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

Very respectfully,

HENRY B. F. MACFARLAND,
President of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Hon. J. W. BABCOCK,
Chairman Committee on the District of Columbia,
House of Representatives.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BABCOCK, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CLOSING PORTION OF ALLEY IN SQUARE 189, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following bill for consideration:

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 4221) authorizing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to extinguish a portion of an alley in square 189.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to abandon that portion of the public alley, 10 feet wide, lying and being in the rear of a portion of lot No. 54, in Hanford & Heiston's subdivision of lots in square No. 189, lying and being in the city of Washington, D. C., as per plat recorded in book 20, page 10, one of the records of the surveyor's office of the said District of Columbia; said portion of said alley being described by metes and bounds as follows: Beginning at the northeast corner of said alley, and running south, on the east line thereof, 10 feet; thence west, on the southerly line of said alley, 20 feet; thence north 10 feet, and thence east 20 feet to the place of beginning, containing in all 200 square feet of ground. And any and all right, title, interest, and demand that the United States of America or the District of Columbia may have in and to the above-described portion of said alley shall revert to the original dedicator, his heirs and assigns, provided he pays to the collector of taxes for the District of Columbia an amount equal to the sum that would have been assessed against the land embraced within the above-described area of the said alley from the time it was laid out to the time this act takes effect as law.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Page 2, in lines 6 to 14, inclusive, strike out the following:

"And any and all right, title, interest, and demand that the United States of America or the District of Columbia may have in and to the above-described portion of said alley shall revert to the original dedicator, his heirs and assigns, provided he pays to the collector of taxes for the District of Columbia an amount equal to the sum that would have been assessed against the land embraced within the above-described area of the said alley from the time it was laid out to the time this act takes effect as law."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

TO REDEEM CERTAIN OUTSTANDING CERTIFICATES OF THE BOARD OF AUDIT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 3243) to redeem certain outstanding certificates of the board of audit of the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to receive and audit certificates of indebtedness No. 7639, for the sum of $11.19; No. 10383, for the sum of $22; No. 16423, for the sum of $21.30; No. 21002, for the sum of $81.70; No. 21323, for the sum of $14.23; for the redemption of which there is no existing law, and to pay to the holders of said certificates the amount due thereon, including interest at the rate of 3.65 per cent per annum from the date of their issue to December 31, 1880; and a sufficient amount of money to pay the principal and interest of the aforesaid certificates is hereby appropriated, one-half from the revenues of the District of Columbia and one-half from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, this bill is on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. It is practically a duplicate of a bill that has been passed through the House a half dozen times covering the same subject, and I would ask unanimous consent that it may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Without objection this course will be pursued.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

Amend the title so that it will read: "A bill to redeem certain outstanding certificates of the board of audit, the board of public works, and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia."

Page 2, line 2, after the word "cents," insert the following: "No. 4665, for the sum of $20.90; No. 4636, for the sum of $20.90; No. 4667, for the sum of $68.20; No. 14780, for the sum of $34.25; No. 13454, for the sum of $43.22; No. 16455, for the sum of $13.19; No. 16456, for the sum of $13.19."

Page 2, line 8, after the word "eighty," insert the following: "and to pay to the holders the amount due on drawback certificates numbered, respectively, 4259, 4616, 7637, 7639, 9570, 9571, 9572, 12869, 15974, 16611, and 16774, amounting in the aggregate to $327.50; and to redeem tax-lien certificates No. 251, for the sum of $9.97; No. 349, for the sum of $9.35; No. 1252, for the sum of $93.37; and No. 5414, for the sum of $17.10; and to pay to the holder of tax-sale certificate on lot 3, square No. 947, the sum of $112.90, with interest at 6 per cent per annum for two years from its date."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The amendment to the title was agreed to.

QUITCLAIM OF INTEREST IN AND TO A CERTAIN SQUARE.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 13791) to quitclaim all interest of the United States of America in and to square 1131, in the city of Washington, D. C., to Sidney Bieber.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to grant and convey unto Sidney Bieber, and his heirs and assigns, all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to a certain square of land in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, known upon the plat or plan of said city as square No. 1131, upon the payment by the said Sidney Bieber into the Treasury of the United States of such sum of money as the said Secretary of the Interior, upon consideration of all the circumstances, shall determine proper to be paid by the said Bieber for the said square.

The following amendments recommended by the committee were read:

Line 3, strike out "the Interior" and insert "War."
Line 11, strike out "the Interior" and insert "War."

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of this bill and that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Without objection, this course will be pursued.

There was no objection.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read the third time, and passed.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

At a banquet given by representative citizens of the city of Washington on Saturday evening last I was asked to make a few remarks in reference to the District of Columbia, and while there were no reporters present I am quoted in the Post as saying:

A city should not be called upon to pay for extraordinary improvements from current revenues. I believe this niggardly policy is wrong, and that when the committee finally understands you justice will be done.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that this is not correct. I did not use the words ascribed to me, and while I might differ as to the general policy to be pursued by Congress toward the District with some of my colleagues, I should not presume to criticise their acts outside of the floor of this House. I want especially to disavow the use of the word "niggardly." What I did say was this:

That the city of Washington should not be called upon to pay for extraordinary improvements from current revenues. I do not think this a wise plan, and believe that when Congress fully understands the situation a more liberal policy will be pursued.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 16970, being the appropriation for the Military Academy.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the House now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Military Academy bill.

The motion was agreed to. Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. BURKE of South Dakota in the chair.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with and that we proceed to the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HAY. I did not understand the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HULL. I simply asked unanimous consent that the first reading be dispensed with and that we proceed to the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HAY. I know no one on this side who wishes time and I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

One saddler, $180.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill one question. Perhaps it would have been a little more proper at the close of paragraph commencing with line 12, page 3. I want to ask how many officers of the Army are now detailed and on duty at West Point Military Academy?

Mr. HULL. If the gentleman will count them up in the bill he will find out. I have not really added them up. It is the number provided by law carried in this appropriation bill. The law provides that these professors shall have the difference between the pay of their rank and a certain higher rank while serving there. They are all provided for in the bill and the clerk can run them up in a few minutes.

Mr. HEPBURN. I was under the impression that there was a large number who are not there by reason of any law, except the general authority that they may be detailed. I have understood that there was a large number, a very large number, of officers now on detail at that post.

Mr. HULL. On examination I find that there are 25 provided for in this bill. I will say to the gentleman that there is one item on page 3 that is new and might have been subject to a point of order. I want to call attention to it now. It provides that the Secretary of War shall assign an officer as assistant professor of modern languages. It was found that it was impossible for one professor of modern languages to teach the classes reporting to him, and we gave authority in this bill for the detail of one more, but no others are detailed here unless by the authority of Congress.

Mr. HEPBURN. My impression is that the gentleman will find that the number of officers at that post is very largely in excess of the number he has mentioned.

Mr. HULL. There is a service detachment there that get no extra pay, of both the artillery and the cavalry and the infantry, and that the law provides for. They are not carried in this bill at all for extra pay. I will say to the gentleman that if he includes these officers it will be a much greater number than I have given; but there is a law providing that one detachment of cavalry, one of infantry, one of artillery, shall be detailed there and called the Army service detachment, and they have the same number of officers that they have in the field. But Congress has passed on that question, and without opposition, Mr. Chairman, adopted a law requiring this detachment to be sent there for the benefit of the cadets.

The Clerk read as follows:

For extra pay of one enlisted man employed as watchman, at 35 cents per day, $191.63.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I should like to make an inquiry of the chairman of the committee [Mr. HULL]. Here are numerous items, "extra pay," "extra pay," "extra pay," all through this page, page 7, and a part of page 6. I should like to have the gentleman tell us why this "extra pay" is called for, and what necessity there is for having this extra work done, calling for extra pay. We should like to know why the regular salary or pay of the officer is not fixed.

Mr. HULL. These items do not refer to officers, but to privates.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But why this extra work and extra pay?

Mr. HULL. If the gentleman will look through the bill he will find that these provisions for extra duty and extra pay go on for several pages further.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes, sir; that is the reason I ask my question.

Mr. HULL. I can tell the gentleman briefly the reason. These men are printers and skilled mechanics, who are enlisted with the idea of their doing this work at this extra pay. If such men were not enlisted and carried on the rolls in this way we should have to hire civilians for this work and pay much higher wages than it now costs the Government by giving extra pay to the enlisted men.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I understand the gentleman then to say that this has been the practice for years?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why would it not be better to have some general statute providing for this work without having it carried in the appropriation bill under the head of "extra work" or "extra pay?"

Mr. HULL. If the appropriations were made here in a lump, as is the case with some other appropriation bills—for instance, the Naval Academy bill—we should simply provide for an expenditure of so much money as extra-duty pay. But for the last twenty years, or at least ever since the distribution of the appropriation bills among the various committees of the House, this form of bill, detailing these particular items, has been customary; this has been the usage year after year. In my judgment, it would be just as well that these detailed appropriations, running over several pages of the bill, should be dispensed with, and a lump appropriation made for a certain amount as extra-duty pay. But such has not been the custom. The present form of bill corresponds with the system of bookkeeping which has been adopted, and with the way the accounts have gone to the Treasury. There can be no confusion by continuing the system as it has been practiced for twenty years past.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I find, for instance, in line 15, page 7, this provision:

For extra pay of two enlisted men employed as clerks in the office of the commandant of cadets, at 50 cents each per day, $365.

This is a sample of many other items under the head of "extra pay." Now, is it customary when a man does this work that he should receive extra pay?

Mr. HULL. Oh, yes; the soldier receives extra pay in the line of the Army whenever he does extra work.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is not the salary of a private in the Army based upon the idea that he shall do whatever work he is called on to do without extra pay?

Mr. HULL. No. A soldier when first enlisted in the Army gets $13 a month. Later, if his service is satisfactory, he may receive $18 a month. This allows $15 a month extra for clerical service, making the wages much less than would be paid for employing a civilian.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. So that when the soldier is engaged in actual war he receives no extra pay, but in time of peace he gets these additional allowances as extra pay?

Mr. HULL. So far as that is concerned, he may get extra pay in time of war as well as in time of peace. This kind of work is done all the year round.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. HULL. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with a recommendation that it pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BURKE of South Dakota reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the Military Academy appropriation bill, and had directed him to report the same back without amendment and with the recommendation that it pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HULL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

AMENDMENT OF BANKRUPTCY LAW.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. 13679) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved July 1, 1898.

The amendments were read.

Mr. JENKINS. I move concurrence in the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I think this is quite an unusual action proposed, considering the importance of the bill, with so many amendments which we have never had in print. It seems to me that before we take up these amendments for consideration the bill ought to be printed in such a shape that we may be able to understand the effect of the amendments.

Mr. JENKINS. These amendments were all printed in the RECORD at least ten days ago.

Mr. McRAE. It is not practicable to take the records and tell what is finally agreed to. The custom of both Houses is to have a bill printed in document form and bill form, so that we have the full text before us.

Mr. JENKINS. I would like to say to the gentleman from Arkansas that there was no debate whatever in the Senate. The Senate adopted the report of the committee and the bill was published in full.

Mr. McRAE. I am pretty sure that the Clerk read some amendment that I could not follow in the print of the bill that was given to me.

Mr. JENKINS. What does the gentlemen suggest?

Mr. McRAE. That the bill be printed in bill form and go over until to-morrow, so that we may see what we are doing. I confess that I can not tell what changes are proposed in the bankrupt law.

Mr. JENKINS. I will frankly say to the gentleman that unless these amendments are concurred in, if we go to conference there will be considerable difficulty in the matter.

Mr. McRAE. And it is very important that we know what we are doing when we do act. We should not be called upon to agree to a lot of Senate amendments when we do not know what they are.

Mr. JENKINS. I would like to say to the gentleman——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Before the gentleman answers the gentleman from Arkansas further, I should like to ask, have these amendments been considered at all by the Judiciary Committee of the House?

Mr. JENKINS. Not as a committee, but every gentleman interested has gone over the ground fully and carefully, and there is an entire agreement that the amendments should be adopted. There is no material change. Every change that is made is beneficial and proper, I assure the gentleman.

Mr. McRAE. That is, in the judgment of the gentlemen who know about it, but there are a great many gentlemen here who have a right to know about it but who do not know about it.

Mr. JENKINS. In the judgment of the gentlemen who have carefully examined the bill and who are anxious that it should pass. I would say to the gentleman that there is strong pressure all over the country for the adoption of these amendments. They strengthen the bill and improve it in many particulars, and the changes made by the Senate are a decided improvement on the House bill.

Mr. McRAE. I understand that there is pressure from those who want to make the bankruptcy law a Federal collection law in order to use its machinery to crush out and oppress the merchants of the country; but we ought to act with caution when we undertake to place additional power and authority over bankrupts in the hands of the Federal judiciary, and at least we owe it to ourselves to know what we are doing.

Mr. JENKINS. These changes reduce that very largely; reduce the fees, limit the expenses, and matters of that kind.

Mr. McRAE. Then it is remarkable that the gentleman in charge of this bill, after having given that consideration to it, after having considered the subject for the time he did, should come back here with all these amendments of the Senate. It is remarkable that he should have omitted so many important matters from the bill and that the Senate has incorporated them into this bill, and that he should now ask the House to accept them without examination. I, for one, can not agree to it, and I hope that if the gentleman will not consent to have this bill printed and let us see what is in it, that the House will require him to do so by voting down his motion and let us take up and consider each amendment separately.

Mr. JENKINS. As I say to the gentleman, this bill has been printed in full in the RECORD, and we have allowed it to remain for about ten days, so that gentlemen might familiarize themselves with it if they desired to do so. The only thing we can do is to move concurrence or nonconcurrence and ask for a conference. I will say to the gentleman that I have just left a conference of gentlemen with reference to this matter, gentlemen who occupy the very same position that my friend from Arkansas does toward the bill, and they insist that these changes are material and beneficial, and that we ought to agree here if possible.

Mr. McRAE. What is the gentleman's motion, to concur?

Mr. JENKINS. I will say to the gentleman from Arkansas that my motion is to concur in the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. McRAE. That is, without any reference to the committee and without any conference. Now, I have no objection to referring these amendments to the Judiciary Committee, and if the Judiciary Committee report back to-morrow, or any day, unanimously that these amendments are beneficial, then we will have something upon which to stand.

Mr. JENKINS. Let me say to the gentleman that I know his views, and there is not a single amendment here but what the gentleman will agree to. I am satisfied of that.

Mr. McRAE. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. JENKINS. If this matter is referred it defeats the amendments and defeats the very object that the gentleman is contending for.

Mr. McRAE. No; I am not contending for this bill. I tell you I never saw a bankruptcy bill that I would vote for since I have been in Congress, and never read one enacted before that I believed beneficial. Instead of amendments, the law should be repealed. No; I do not believe in them, and I believe that the business men of the country want to have the law repealed.

Mr. JENKINS. We can not raise the question of repeal at this time. That question is removed. The question is whether we shall adopt these remedial amendments. It reduces the fees over half and limits the expense, and every Senate amendment is in harmony with the gentleman's line of thought.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to bandy words with the gentleman, but I say this is an unusual request to make. This is a law that ought to be a temporary law, but is sought to be made a permanent one, is being used to-day by the commercial world, and is doing more harm and injury than good. Instead of wiping it off the statute books, the gentleman is seeking to extend it.

Mr. JENKINS. The gentleman is mistaken in that. It limits its operations and reduces the fees over one-half and limits the expense; and the amendments of the Senate are all remedial.

Mr. McRAE. It increases acts of bankruptcy.

Mr. JENKINS. No; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. McRAE. And amends a number of others.

Mr. JENKINS. It does not include a single new act. I have just left a conference with a gentleman who occupies the very same position that my friend from Arkansas does, who has always argued for the repeal, who has asked me as a personal favor to get these amendments agreed to as soon as possible. He states that as he can not get a repeal of the law he is more than satisfied with these amendments.

Mr. McRAE. Well, Mr. Speaker, I hope that the motion will not be agreed to. I am not prepared this morning to vote on these amendments.

Mr. JENKINS. I will say to the gentleman that I have no disposition, if I had the right, to railroad this measure through. It is not an unusual method to agree to Senate amendments. Several gentlemen interested in this measure have carefully gone over them for over a week. Every member of the Committee on the Judiciary is entirely familiar with each and every one of the amendments, and not a single gentleman on the committee has raised a single objection to the Senate amendments to the bill, and several gentlemen here, too, who think the law ought to be repealed.

Mr. McRAE. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri, who is a member of the committee.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, so far as I know this matter had no consideration whatever in the Committee on the Judiciary. I think the proper course is to refer it to that committee. I think that is the general course of procedure here when very many amendments have been made, especially to a bill which has passed in this body; it is referred again to the committee. This measure emanated from the Judiciary Committee and was passed upon there. This bill was passed in this House a long time ago. The fact that there may or may not be some delay in its consideration and disposition here certainly has nothing to do with the question of disposing of it in an orderly way and upon the merits. Whatever delay has occurred so far has occurred in the Senate and not here.

Now, I take it that my friend from Wisconsin will see it in the same way, that the orderly method of procedure and the correct method of procedure is to refer this bill with the pending amendments to the Committee on the Judiciary; let that committee report on them to the House, and the House dispose of them. For my part I have given them no consideration, and had no idea that an effort would be made to agree to them. After such a consideration I may be in favor of or I may not be in favor of the amendments; I do not know.

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Certainly.

Mr. JENKINS. Does not the gentleman remember that I called his attention to this proposition, and told him I was considering these amendments in company with other gentlemen, and that my friend told me that he favored a repeal of the law and was absolutely opposed to all of its provisions? I only say that because the gentleman says that he was not informed of the fact that the question was before the committee.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I do not question the conversation since the gentleman suggests it took place.

Mr. JENKINS. I invited the gentleman to confer with us.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I do not recollect certainly any invitation to conference.

Mr. JENKINS. I simply said that we were considering the amendments. The gentleman from Massachusetts was with me looking over the matter, interested in it, because we thought we could not get along without that method of proceeding. But, Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as there is objection to concurring, I move that we now disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin withdraws his first motion and moves that the House disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin that a better method would be to have the bill referred to the committee, because the committee may agree to the amendment.

Mr. JENKINS. That would be a defeat of the bill. These amendments limit the expense and permit the matter of exemption to be determined by the laws of the State rather than by the laws of Congress.

Mr. DE ARMOND. The assumption that the reference to the committee defeats the bill I think is hardly warranted by the facts. It seems to me there is no ground for that assumption. There are certainly five weeks remaining of this session. But even if that were true, if the Senate held the bill for months, the compound reason for the two facts is not sufficient for putting it through in any but the usual way. If the House votes upon it, it votes in the dark.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I understand the amendments come from the Senate in this bill as passed by the Senate——

Mr. JENKINS. This is a House bill with Senate amendments.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But the Senate amendments allowed the exemption to be determined by the State law rather than our law. As I understand the bill as it came back, and I think I am correct about the provision in the bill, provides that where a man was allowed to waive his exemption in the State he would not be allowed to go into the bankrupt court and claim them and thereby commit a fraud on the creditor, as he is doing now. I understand the Senate has stricken that provision out of the House bill and leaves it as the law is now, not as the committee intended to write the law, but as it has been construed, which allows the debtor to commit a fraud on his creditor.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin indulge me a moment?

Mr. JENKINS. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I can see very readily why the gentleman from Wisconsin, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, does not want the bill referred to the Judiciary Committee, because it will lose its privileged character when it is reported back. If it goes to conference of course it would be privileged; but it would cause more delay, I suggest, by sending it to conference rather than to the Judiciary Committee, if the Judiciary Committee will agree to the Senate amendments. I was going to suggest that if the gentleman would refer it with the amendments to the committee, with leave to report the bill, it would still retain its privileged character, and it might be they would concur in the Senate amendments, and if so, there would be no delay. I make the suggestion in order that the privileged character of the bill may be retained.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, would it not be better to let it all go over until to-morrow?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I would not object to that; but if referred to the Judiciary Committee with leave to report it any time, they can report it back to-morrow morning.

Mr. JENKINS. It could not be reported before Friday morning. But, Mr. Speaker, in order to meet the objection I will ask unanimous consent that this may go over until to-morrow and that the bill and amendments be printed in full in the RECORD.

Mr. McRAE. Have it printed in bill form; it will not cost any more.

Mr. JENKINS. And that it be printed as a bill—in bill form.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. The most important amendment to the law, as I remember it in the original bill, was that which modified the four months provision as to payments on account. Do the Senate amendments in any way change that provision as originally presented by the committee?

Mr. JENKINS. The bill will be printed to-morrow in the RECORD and the gentleman can see what that provision is.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that there is a rule coming up to-morrow giving the day to the matters presented by the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. JENKINS. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will say day after to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the bill and amendments be printed in bill form and in the RECORD, and that the matter may be set down for consideration on Wednesday next. If there is no objection, this order will be made. The Chair hears none.

CORPORATIONS ENGAGED IN INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up a report, and ask that members of the Judiciary Committee may file personal views if they desire any time during the present week. It is a report on House bill——

The SPEAKER. The report should go to the basket, unless the gentleman asks unanimous consent.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I ask unanimous consent in this connection that members of the Judiciary Committee may have during the present week to file personal views on this same measure. That will necessitate unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman send up the report?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I desire to ask further unanimous consent——

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the title of the bill accompanying this report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill requiring corporations engaged in interstate commerce to make returns, prohibiting rebates and discriminations to the use of interstate commerce in attempts to destroy competition, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] in connection with this report asks unanimous consent that all members of the Judiciary Committee be allowed this week in which to file their individual views on the bill. If there be no objection this order will be made. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I desire also to ask unanimous consent that there be printed 5,000 copies of this report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the further request that there be printed for the use of members of the House 5,000 copies of the report. Is there objection to this request?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I suggest that the request embrace the views of such members as may file their views upon the bill. I judge there is no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the gentleman from Missouri. Does he ask that the views of gentlemen filing their individual views be printed with this report?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Not that they be printed with the report, but that the same number of those views be printed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri adds to the request of the gentleman from Indiana the request that the individual views of the members of the Committee on the Judiciary be printed in equal number with the report; that is, that the order for 5,000 extra copies apply to the individual views of members as well as to the report of the committee.

Mr. McCLEARY. How are these to be distributed?

Mr. OVERSTREET. My request was simply that the report be printed in the usual way and distributed through the document room.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. A parliamentary inquiry. I do not understand whether the request of the gentleman from Indiana includes the bill.

Mr. OVERSTREET. My proposition was that the substitute agreed upon by the majority of the Judiciary Committee be printed with the report—at the end of the report; that the substitute follow the report.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I was not aware of that fact. Then the distribution ought to take place through the folding room rather than the document room.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I have no personal objection to that.

But my experience is that it would meet the convenience of members better if distributed through the document room.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. There is a desire on the part of a number of gentlemen to have these documents distributed through the folding room, and I think that is better.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I have no objection.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The usual number will go to the files at any rate.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee make that request?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do, unless the gentleman from Indiana includes it with his request.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will restate the request as he now understands it. It is that 5,000 copies of this report be printed for the use of the members of the House, and that a corresponding number of the views of the members of the Judiciary Committee, which they will have this week to submit, be printed and distributed to members through the folding room. Has the Chair correctly stated the request?

Mr. MANN. I hope there will be included in the request a provision for the printing of an equal number of the bill as amended—not merely attached to the report, but in bill form. Nearly everybody who makes a request in this matter asks for the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will first dispose of the requests already made. Is there objection to the request just stated by the Chair? The Chair hears none. The request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will now be repeated.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that 5,000 copies of the bill, as now reported, be printed in bill form, instead of the usual number.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that 5,000 copies, instead of the usual number, of this bill be printed in bill form for the use of members, to be distributed through the folding room?

Mr. MANN. That is immaterial to me. I think the document room would be better.

The SPEAKER. Then there is no request on that point. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois, and it is so ordered.

DEEDS, ETC., IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the bill (S. 5678) providing for record of deeds and other conveyances and instruments of writing in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes. On this bill the Senate has disagreed to the amendments of the House, and requests a conference.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the House insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. LACEY, and Mr. LITTLE as conferees on the part of the House.

F. M. VOWELLS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House, with an amendment of the Senate, the bill (H. R. 1592) for the relief of F. M. Vowells.

Mr. CAPRON. I move that the House concur in the amendment of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

TERMS OF COURT IN THE DISTRICT OF UTAH.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 149) to provide for holding terms of court in the district of Utah, with sundry House amendments thereto disagreed to by the Senate, and a conference asked for.

On motion of Mr. JENKINS, the House insisted upon its amendments and agreed to the conference asked for by the Senate; and the Speaker announced as conferees on the part of the House Mr. JENKINS, Mr. PARKER, and Mr. DE ARMOND.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15804) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes, with Mr. GROSVENOR in the chair.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CURTIS. If possible, I should like to obtain an agreement with the gentleman on the other side as to the time that shall be occupied in general debate.

Mr. LITTLE. What time would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. CURTIS. I should suggest an hour and a half on a side.

Mr. LITTLE. I think that is satisfactory.

Mr. CURTIS. Then I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to three hours, one hour and a half to be controlled by the gentleman from Arkansas——

Mr. BURTON. I desire to know who is to control the time on the respective sides. I have some desire to be heard on this bill, and not being a member of the committee I would not be entitled to time from either side.

Mr. CURTIS. I suggest that the time be controlled by the gentleman from Arkansas on the Democratic side, and by the chairman of the committee [Mr. SHERMAN] on this side, and in the absence of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] I will yield one hour to the gentleman from Ohio, if he desires that much time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that general debate on the pending bill be limited to three hours, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE], one-half by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] when he shall return, and in the meantime a private arrangement has been made in regard to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] having time. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CURTIS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for one hour.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, to many members of the House this Indian appropriation bill is like a sealed book. Every year it passes after very brief discussion and with little consideration of its numerous items. There is a vague impression, both in the House and in the country, that it is full of objectionable items, and is characterized by waste and extravagance. With a desire to inform myself upon this subject I have made some study of Indian reports and the history of our Indian policy. I approach this subject without any bias and as the representative of a constituency having no interest in the subject except to secure just and proper treatment for the Indians and the judicious appropriation and expenditure of public moneys.

There are many things in the bill which to a superficial observer seem worthy of attention, especially the very large expenditures.

The total amount recommended in the pending bill for the year 1904 is $7,715,930.52. To this, however, must be added certain permanent or indefinite annual appropriations which are also a charge upon the Treasury, as follows: (1) Principal and interest of trust funds, $2,000,000; (2) proceeds of pasturage, labor, etc., act of March 5, 1883, $800,000; (3) civilization of the Sioux, $50,000; total permanent annual appropriations, $2,850,000; total expenditures for Indians for 1904, $10,565,930.52. As contrasted with this amount, the total expenditure of the Indian Department from 1789 to 1831, a period of forty-two years, was $9,055,512.11.

Although this smaller amount of money was expended from 1789 to 1831, it was a period in which many treaties were made with the Indians, and vast areas, great as an empire, were surrendered to the Government. The line of settlement was constantly pushing westward, to the exclusion of Indians in the great States of the Middle West. Our attention must certainly be attracted, not only to the large amounts to be expended, but also to the wearisome iteration of the appropriations, "For support and civilization," "for education and civilization," which have occurred in this bill for many years, and which distribute money by thousands, tens of thousands, and hundreds of thousands of dollars to the various Indian tribes.

It is no exaggeration to say that this bill contains appropriations for schools which afford the pupils comforts and conveniences, not only far beyond those enjoyed by white students in colleges, but of a quality enjoyed only by a favored few. The non-reservation schools are being provided with electric lighting, cold storage, water supply, and ice plants, also hospitals and lavatories, as well as expensive dining rooms and kitchens, etc. Notwithstanding it is claimed that the purpose and object of Indian education is to teach industrial habits, schools are fitted with steam laundry plants, where the work is done by machinery rather than by hand.

I want to say at the outset that, while I shall make criticisms of the Committee on Indian Affairs and the Indian Department, I do not think the blame lies at their door. I believe that the present Committee on Indian Affairs of the House during the last seven years, under the leadership of its chairman and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], has inaugurated more reforms than were instituted in the twenty years preceding. I believe that the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs, during the five years of his incumbency in the office, has developed a grasp of the situation and has proposed reforms of abuses which entitle him to our highest commendation. That for which criticism is most deserved is the inertia of the Department and of Congress; their slowness in making changes to meet changed conditions. Our policy is like the management of a ship sailed in accordance with the rule that no barnacles shall ever be removed from it. A critical examination of this bill will disclose that it almost exactly follows the estimates which came from the Interior Department. So that the Committee on Indian Affairs merely performed a sort of clerical service in shaping this bill.

In one of the numerous conferences of friends of the Indians the Commissioner of Indian Affairs criticised many items of expense incurred in furtherance of our Indian policy. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] following him called his attention to the fact that notwithstanding his attacks upon these items he had recently sent in estimates recommending over $4,000,000 for the very objects which he criticised. What is the origin of these large expenses? They are in a great measure an inheritance from the past. The century before the last our Government commenced to make treaties granting annuities to the Indian tribes, some of which were perpetual. From that time to this very large allowances have been made for their lands, and the amounts have been invested for the Indians or deposited in the Treasury with the provision that annual interest shall be paid to them. We often think when we are considering the action of our forefathers in legislation that they acted hastily or injudiciously.

A more careful examination will almost always show that there were existing reasons which, in view of conditions at the time, were considered valid. Among these reasons I would mention, first, a desire for tranquillity. It was desired that the pioneer settler might be free from constant danger from marauding Indians; that his home might be one of peace rather than of war and strife. So, beginning about 1790, largesses and presents were given to the Indians, and very considerable payments were made for cessions of land. It was thought desirable to bring to an end the warfare with the Cherokees and the Creeks, and to obtain peace, even if it must be purchased. At a later period it occurred to the authorities that rather than to be continually fighting the Apaches and Comanches, or sending military forces for their suppression, a cessation of their attacks must be secured and peace maintained by taking upon ourselves the burden of their support.

The second reason which I would mention was the very natural failure to foresee the unprecedented growth of this country. It may be surprising to some to know that after the Louisiana purchase in 1804 the proposition was gravely considered of dividing this country in half, retaining for the white race all that portion east of the Mississippi River and abandoning that west of it to the red man. In the year 1851, a much more recent date, a treaty was made with the Sioux by which a tract containing 110,000 square miles was reserved for them, including the best part of the State of Colorado, and some of the best portions of Kansas, Nebraska, and the Dakotas. A third reason may be found in those sentiments of humanity and fair play which are characteristic of the American people. These sentiments, aroused by accusations of injustice and influenced by the projects of impracticable philanthropists, have led us into many excesses and absurdities.

I most confidently deny that our policy toward the Indian has been one of injustice or wrong. It has been styled a "century of dishonor." It does not deserve the name, and that appellation is not true. No doubt there have been serious mistakes. There have been wavering and vaccillating methods, but year by year, notwithstanding the barbarity and savagery which the Indian has often manifested, notwithstanding the massacres of hundreds of women and children, notwithstanding the implacable hatred of many of the Indian tribes, there is one thing that appears plain—a disposition to do justice to the red man. We may have sometimes acted under the impulse of excitement or sudden anger, but the general policy of this country has been far more just to these wandering tribes than that of any other nation on the globe toward peoples less civilized than they.

We can challenge comparison in this particular and assert with confidence that no government similarly circumstanced has ever shown a policy so just, so humane, so generous, as has been that of the United States Government toward the Indian tribes.

I will ask attention in proof of this to some statutes and treaties, and to quotations from the messages of Presidents. On the 30th of March, 1802, an act was passed directing that friendly Indians should be furnished with useful domestic animals and implements of husbandry, and with goods and money. At the beginning of the last century almost every treaty provided for the maintenance among the Indians of blacksmiths, farmers, and other helpers, in order to provide for their wants and instruct them in the care of their guns and agricultural implements and to instruct them in farming. On the 3d of March, 1819, an annual appropriation of $10,000 was made for the purpose of providing against the further decline and final extinction of the Indian tribes adjoining the frontier settlements of the United States, and for introducing among them the habits of civilization.

The act further states:

The President is authorized to employ capable persons of good moral character to instruct them in agriculture suitable to their station, and for teaching their children reading, writing, and arithmetic.

To protect the Indians against the dishonesty of private traders, President Washington several times recommended the establishment of Government trading houses to deal directly with the Indians, and to purchase their furs and other articles which they desired to sell. This recommendation was adopted by the act of April 18, 1796, and for twenty-six years, or until the 6th of May, 1822, this policy was continued. It was continued at a very large expense, Congress appropriating a hundred thousand dollars at one time and a hundred and fifty thousand dollars at another, and that, too, at a time when money was not so plentiful in the national exchequer as it now is.

On the 9th of January, 1837, an act was passed providing that the proceeds of Indian lands should be invested and annual interest paid the Indians. It was required that no investment of such money or any portion thereof should draw interest at a lower rate than 5 per cent per annum. Recently these amounts have been retained in the Treasury and interest at 5 per cent paid by the Government. This act is still in force as section 2096 of the Revised Statutes. This rate of 5 per cent is paid, notwithstanding the fact that Government bonds which draw 2 per cent are at a premium, and there are no reliable savings banks in our largest States which pay more than 4 per cent.

The act of June 12, 1834, contains two provisions in which the rights of the Indians against the white race were sustained with the utmost severity. There is nothing on our statute books which so notably discriminates against the white race. This is the first provision:

Whenever, in the commission, by a white person, of any crime, offense, or misdemeanor within the Indian country, the property of any friendly Indian is taken, injured, or destroyed and a conviction is had for such crime, offense, or misdemeanor, the person so convicted shall be sentenced to pay to such friendly Indian to whom the property may belong or whose person may be injured a sum equal to twice the just value of the property so taken, injured, or destroyed.

This statute is still in force as section 2154 of the Revised Statutes, and there is a further provision to the effect that when wrong is done to a friendly Indian and the convicted wrongdoer can not pay the penalty, an amount equivalent to the injury done shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. CURTIS. Does the gentleman from Ohio know of any dollar of money that can be paid under that statute?

Mr. BURTON. Perhaps not.

Mr. CURTIS. Not one.

Mr. BURTON. But Congress has certainly done its duty.

Then there is another statute, passed at the same time, which has been in force for nearly seventy years, providing that in all trials about the right to property, in which an Indian may be a party on one side and a white person on the other, the burden of proof shall rest upon the white person whenever an Indian shall make out a presumption of title in himself from the fact of previous possession or ownership. This is the only law I can recall which modifies the law of evidence for the benefit of any race or class in the United States.

The act of April 10, 1869, Revised Statutes, section 2039, provides that there shall be a board of Indian commissioners composed of not more than ten members, appointed by the President solely from men eminent for intelligence and philanthropy, and who shall serve without pecuniary compensation. This board shall supervise all expenditures for the benefit of the Indians and shall inspect all goods purchased for Indians. This statute, adopted at the very beginning of the Administration of President Grant, indicated a purpose to place the interests of the Indians in the hands of those who would treat them not only with fairness, but with the greatest benevolence. From that time to this men of the highest character have been appointed upon this commission. It may well be questioned whether the policies recommended by them have not been in the line of undue generosity and assistance to the red man.

President Washington, in his third annual message, October 25, 1791, in speaking of the relations of the United States to the Indians, says:

Among the most important of these is the defense and security of the Western frontiers. To accomplish it on the most humane principles was a primary wish.

After speaking of the making of treaties with well-disposed tribes of Indians, he stated:

Effectual measures have been adopted to make those of a hostile description sensible that a pacification was desired upon terms of moderation and justice. * * *

It is sincerely to be desired that all need of coercion in future may cease and that an intimate intercourse may succeed, calculated to advance the happiness of the Indians and to attach them firmly to the United States.

In order to do this it seems necessary that they should experience the benefits of an impartial dispensation of justice. That the mode of alienating their lands, the main source of discontent and war, should be so defined and regulated as to obviate imposition and as far as may be practicable controversy concerning the reality and extent of the alienations which are made.

That commerce with them should be promoted under regulations tending to secure an equitable deportment toward them, and that such rational experiments should be made for imparting to them the blessings of civilization as may from time to time suit their condition. * * *

A system corresponding with the mild principles of religion and philanthropy toward an unenlightened race of men, whose happiness materially depends on the conduct of the United States, would be as honorable to the national character as conformable to the dictates of sound policy.

President Madison in his last annual message, dated December 3, 1816, says, calling attention to the existence of conflicting titles of different Indian tribes, which was a serious source of difficulty:

In some instances the titles, though not supported by due proof and clashing those of one tribe with the claims of another, have been extinguished by double purchases, the benevolent policy of the United States preferring the augmented expense to the hazard of doing injustice or to the enforcement of justice against a feeble and untutored people by means involving or threatening an effusion of blood. I am happy to add that the tranquillity which has been restored among the tribes themselves as well as between them and our own population will favor the resumption of the work of civilization, which has made an encouraging progress among some tribes, and that the facility is increasing for extending that divided and individual ownership, which exists now in movable property only, to the soil itself, and of thus establishing in the culture and improvement of it the true foundation for a transit from the habits of the savage to the arts and comforts of social life.

In the line of what the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] has suggested by his question, I do not deny that in many portions of the country the sentiment is such that it is very hard for Indians to obtain justice. A military officer told me a few evenings since of an instance in which a cowboy fired his pistol with the reckless idea of firing through the top of the tall hat of an Indian; but his aim was unsteady and the ball grazed the Indian's head. As a result he was paralyzed and died. The chief of the tribe to which the Indian thus killed had belonged in retaliation set fire to the little hut of the cowboy, inflicting damage to the extent of some fifteen or twenty dollars. A trial was asked. The Indian was sentenced for five years, while the cowboy went free.

Such an instance as this is a reproach on the administration of justice upon the border. But the question arises whether, if the numerous privileges and favors which like a network surround the Indian were removed, would not the disposition of those people, whom I can not suspect of studied and continued injustice, be to do justice to all men alike, whether white or red?

I do not stand here as an apologist for the retaliation and outrages which have been visited upon the Indian; but when the great balance sheet is drawn up it will appear that the wrongs have been far greater and the aggressions more numerous, the cruelties committed more frequent, on the part of the Indian than on the part of the white man. The difficulty has been that the Indian has sometimes been held at arm's length, as it were, from the body of the people and compelled to deal with the Indian agent—not always a very honest man—with the border man, or the cowboy, some of whom have sought to plunder him and have made free to appropriate to themselves whatever they could obtain by force or by fraud.

The immense quantities of land reserved for these Indians must attract our attention. One hundred and eighteen thousand square miles are now set apart for them in reservations—an area about three times as large as the State of Ohio. Much of this is arid land; much of it is fit for grazing only. On the other hand, many large tracts are to be numbered among the very best lands in the United States. Under the treaties made with the Choctaws, the Creeks, and the Cherokees, by which they were to be located in the Indian Territory, they were apportioned land to the amount of approximately 1,000 acres apiece. Fifteen thousand Choctaws received 15,000,000 acres, and other smaller tribes received a still larger per capita apportionment. It may be said of these lands that they are now a garden spot, equal in fertility to any lands in the United States.

It is frequently asserted that the nations which discovered this continent recognized that the title to the land belonged to the occupying tribes. It would be difficult, however, to find in the exchequer accounts of Spain, England, or France a single instance in which money was paid out for the purchase of Indian lands. They were given presents and a great deal of tinsel was bestowed upon them, but it is evident that this was done to promote good feeling rather than as a recognition that any compensation was due. Mr. Parkman, in his work, The Pioneers of France, to illustrate the disposition of the Spaniards toward the Indians in the first century after the discovery of America, quotes an address of Dr. Pedro de Santander to the King, in 1557, as follows:

It is lawful that Your Majesty, like a good shepherd, appointed by the hand of the Eternal Father, should tend and lead out your sheep, since the Holy Spirit has shown spreading pastures whereon are feeding lost sheep, which have been snatched away by the dragon, the demon. These pastures are the New World, wherein is comprised Florida, now in possession of the demon; and here he makes himself adored and revered. This is the land of promise possessed by idolaters, the Amorite, Amelekite, Moabite, Canaanite. This is the land promised by the Eternal Father to the faithful, since we are commanded by God in the Holy Scriptures to take it from them, being idolaters, and, by reason of their idolatry and sin, to put them all to the knife, leaving no living thing save maidens and children, their cities robbed and sacked, their walls and houses leveled to the earth.

It would appear that Spain at no time admitted the existence of any title in the Indians. Mexico has maintained the same position with reference to those located in the territory acquired from that country. In some remarks made by the gentleman from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] last winter, it was clearly set forth that in New Mexico, Arizona, and Utah the United States, succeeding to the title of the Mexicans, could claim absolute ownership of the lands occupied by the different tribes, because, under well-established rules of international law, the conquering country, or that which receives a cession, obtains the same kind of title as its predecessor.

The French showed greater adroitness than either the Spanish or the English in dealing with the Indians, but they do not seem to have recognized any obligation to purchase their lands.

While there are shadowy indications of an acknowledgment by the English of some sort of title in the Indian tribes, there was no distinct admission of it. Grants were made of vast areas without mention of any subordinate titles to be extinguished or acquired by the grantees.

King Charles the Second made over to his cousin, Prince Rupert, the vast expanse known as Rupert's Land, afterwards Hudson Bay Territory. William Penn bargained with the Indians for the lands granted to him by King Charles the Second, but it does not seem to have been considered either that this was necessary, or that he acquired any additional right by so doing.

The early charters and patents from the English Kings enjoined upon the settlers the necessity of converting the savages and bringing them to a knowledge of the gospel, but this was the principal injunction in the formal documents which gave title. It is true that in 1629 the governor of the Massachusetts Bay Company, living in England, wrote to Endicott, the resident officer in Massachusetts:

If any of the salvages [savages] pretend right of inheritance to all or any part of the lands in our patent, endeavor to purchase their tytle, that we may avoid the least scruple of intrusion.

Chief Justice Marshall in one of his decisions says:

The potentates of the Old World found no difficulty in convincing themselves that they made ample compensation to the inhabitants of the new by bestowing upon them civilization and Christianity.

The problem was very much modified by early conditions. Many of the adventurers who came to this continent brought no families with them and were almost as roving and unsettled as the Indians themselves. Their commercial transactions consisted for the most part in the purchase of furs. Then, too, there were unoccupied tracts of considerable size available for settlement, concerning which no question of the Indian right of occupancy could arise.

The colonists would seem to have been the first to recognize the principle that an Indian title existed which must be acquired. This principle was followed after the formation of the Federal Government. Two rules were firmly established: First, that no Indian tribe had a right to sell its lands to any foreign nation, or to any individual; a cession could only be made to the Government of the United States; second, that a right of occupancy existed in the Indians, which must be obtained by treaty or by conquest.

The early treaties were in some respects similar to those entered into between nations, though the Indians acknowledged themselves to be under the protection of the United States. Considerable cessions of territory were made without any considerable compensation. These engagements recognized that the boundaries of the Indian claims were uncertain and the limits of their possessions were restricted. In later treaties compensation was given in the form of annuities, immediate cash payments, or agreements for assistance in the way of education, or otherwise. It was often recognized that there was confusion between different Indian tribes as regards ownership. Later still the compensation was very materially increased. Part of the payments made for these titles is represented by trust funds held for the Indians in the Treasury, now amounting to over $35,000,000.

It should be stated that, by a statute of March 3, 1871, treaties were abolished, and it was provided that in the future agreements should be made with the Indians, to be thereafter ratified by Congress. This statute removed an incongruity, because theretofore we had treated with those over whom we had assumed guardianship as if they were independent.

It may well be questioned whether the measure of value which the Indian should receive for his land is the value for agriculture or for civilized occupation, when we take into account that he showed no disposition to use it except to hunt or fish upon it. Doubtless, there was a considerable degree of compulsion in some of these treaties or agreements for the acquisition of land. How could this be avoided? To admit that absolute consent must be obtained before we could occupy portions of this country would sanction a rule under which it would have been necessary for the early settlers of Massachusetts and Virginia to have stayed away and left this continent for all time in the possession of wandering tribes. It would lead to the conclusion that civilization can not exclude barbarism from any part of the earth.

I desire to point out at this time the three distinctive errors of the Indian system, and on this subject I will ask the Clerk to read from the report of the Indian Commissioner for the year 1901, from page 1, beginning with the words "Well-meant mistakes," down to the words "Throwing the Indian on his own resources," on page 4.

The Clerk read as follows:

WELL-MEANT MISTAKES.

In the last annual report some attention was given to the obstacles in the way of the Indian toward independence and self-support, and three of the most important were pointed out and made the subject of discussion. It was shown that the indiscriminate issue of rations was an effectual barrier to civilization; that the periodical distribution of large sums of money was demoralizing in the extreme, and that the general leasing of allotments instead of benefiting the Indians, as originally intended, only contributed to their demoralization.

Further observation and reflection leads to the unwelcome conviction that another obstacle may be added to these already named, and that is education. It is to be distinctly understood that it is not meant by this to condemn education in the abstract—far from it; its advantages are too many and too apparent to need any demonstration here.

Neither is it meant as a criticism upon the conduct or management of any particular school or schools now in operation. What is meant is that the present Indian educational system, taken as a whole, is not calculated to produce the results so earnestly claimed for it and so hopefully anticipated when it was begun.

No doubt this idea will be received with some surprise, and expressions of dissent will doubtless spring at once to the lips of many of those engaged or interested in Indian work. Nevertheless, a brief view of the plan in vogue will, it is believed, convince the most skeptical that the idea is correct.

There are in operation at the present time 113 boarding schools, with an average attendance of something over 16,000 pupils, ranging from 5 to 21 years old. These pupils are gathered from the cabin, the wickiup, and the tepee. Partly by cajolery and partly by threats, partly by bribery and partly by fraud, partly by persuasion and partly by force, they are induced to leave their homes and their kindred to enter these schools and take upon themselves the outward semblance of civilized life. They are chosen not on account of any particular merit of their own, not by reason of mental fitness, but solely because they have Indian blood in their veins. Without regard to their worldly condition, without any previous training, without any preparation whatever, they are transported to the schools—sometimes thousands of miles away—without the slightest expense or trouble to themselves or their people.

The Indian youth finds himself at once, as if by magic, translated from a state of poverty to one of affluence. He is well fed and clothed and lodged. Books and all the accessories of learning are given him and teachers provided to instruct him. He is educated in the industrial arts on the one hand, and not only in the rudiments but in the liberal arts on the other. Beyond "the three R's" he is instructed in geography, grammar, and history; he is taught drawing, algebra and geometry, music, and astronomy, and receives lessons in physiology, botany, and entomology. Matrons wait on him while he is well and physicians and nurses attend him when he is sick. A steam laundry does his washing and the latest modern appliances do his cooking. A library affords him relaxation for his leisure hours, athletic sports and the gymnasium furnish him exercise and recreation, while music entertains him in the evening. He has hot and cold baths and steam heat and electric light and all the modern conveniences. All of the necessities of life are given him and many of the luxuries. All of this without money and without price or the contribution of a single effort of his own or of his people. His wants are all supplied almost for the wish. The child of the wigwam becomes a modern Aladdin, who has only to rub the Government lamp to gratify his desires.

Here he remains until his education is finished, when he is returned to his home—which by contrast must seem squalid indeed—to the parents whom his education must make it difficult to honor, and left to make his way against the ignorance and bigotry of his tribe. Is it any wonder he fails? Is it surprising if he lapses into barbarism? Not having earned his education, it is not appreciated; having made no sacrifice to obtain it, it is not valued. It is looked upon as a right and not as a privilege; it is accepted as a favor to the Government and not to the recipient, and the almost inevitable tendency is to encourage dependence, foster pride, and create a spirit of arrogance and selfishness. The testimony on this point of those closely connected with the Indian employees of the service would, it is believed, be interesting.

It is not denied that some good flows from this system. It would be singular if there did not after all the effort that has been made and the money that has been lavished.

In the last twenty years fully $45,000,000 have been spent by the Government alone for the education of Indian pupils, and it is a liberal estimate to put the number of those so educated at not over 20,000. If the present rate is continued for another twenty years it will take over $70,000,000 more.

But while it is not denied that the system has produced some good results, it is seriously questioned whether it is calculated to accomplish the great end in view, which is not so much the education of the individual as the lifting up of the race.

It is contended, and with reason, that with the same effort and much less expenditure applied locally or to the family circle far greater and much more beneficent results could have been obtained and the tribes would have been in a much more advanced stage of civilization than at present.

On the other hand it is said that the stream of returning pupils carries with it the refining influence of the schools and operates to elevate the people. Doubtless this is true of individual cases and it may have some faint influence on the tribes. But will it ever sufficiently leaven the entire mass? It is doubtful. It may be possible in time to purify a fountain by cleansing its turbid waters as they pour forth and then returning them to their original source. But experience is against it. For centuries pure fresh-water streams have poured their floods into the Great Salt Lake, and its waters are salt still.

What, then, shall be done? And this inquiry brings into prominence at once the whole Indian question.

It may be well first to take a glance at what has been done. For about a generation the Government has been taking a very active interest in the welfare of the Indian. In that time he has been located on reservations and fed and clothed; he has been supplied lavishly with utensils and means to earn his living, with materials for his dwelling and articles to furnish it; his children have been educated and money has been paid him; farmers and mechanics have been supplied him, and he has received aid in a multitude of different ways. In the last thirty-three years over $240,000,000 have been spent upon an Indian population not exceeding 180,000, enough, if equitably divided, to build each one a house suitable to his condition and furnish it throughout, to fence his land and build him a barn, to buy him a wagon and team and harness, to furnish him plows and the other implements necessary to cultivate the ground, and to give him something besides to embellish and beautify his home. It is not pretended that this amount is exact, but it is sufficiently so for the purposes of this discussion.

What is his condition to-day? He is still on his reservation; he is still being fed; his children are still being educated and money is still being paid him; he is still dependent upon the Government for existence; mechanics wait on him and farmers still aid him; he is little, if any, nearer the goal of independence than he was thirty years ago, and if the present policy is continued he will get little, if any, nearer in thirty years to come. It is not denied that under this, as under the school system, there has been some progress, but it has not been commensurate with the money spent and effort made.

First, the ration system. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in his report for 1901, says:

It would seem rather a sad commentary on the ration system to see Indians driving into the agency regularly in buggies and carriages to receive a gratuitous distribution of supplies from an indulgent Government "to keep them from starving."

In a report filed in this House as Document No. 391 of the Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, it was shown that a tribe of Sioux Indians having 20,000 cattle, of which they sold annually to the United States 1,500 to be slaughtered on the reservation and distributed among themselves, had been receiving rations under a provision in a treaty of 1876, promising them a certain prescribed ration, to be continued until they were able to support themselves. The cattle they sold realized for them over $50,000 and they themselves ate them. They had also nearly 10,000 horses and a considerable number of sheep and of other stock.

It also appeared that most of those drawing a salary from the Government, the number of whom was about 150 on the reservation, receiving salaries from $840 down to $120, together with employees in the schools on the reservation, drew rations.

It is a mistake to suppose that by constantly pampering and coddling we can lift these Indians up to a status of civilized life. No nation ever achieved liberty unless it was willing to fight for it, and no nation or tribe ever gained civilization unless it was willing, by patient industry, to carve out for itself a future.

I would not say that the infirm and those who are unable to earn a living should be denied a ration. If we will, we might treat them all as our wards and save them from destitution and starvation; but let not our policy be one that builds up and perpetuates a system the main characteristic of which is the prevalence of idleness and which, in the long run, is the very worst thing for the Indian himself.

It is far from my intention in making these remarks to dwell upon the pecuniary problem alone. I am not arguing to save the Treasury so much as for a judicious and rational policy toward these people. The policy as at present managed injures them more than it injures anyone else. If they are able to work, let them work; let us begin with the preliminary lesson, that they can not depend upon us for that which they do not deserve; but that we intend to throw them upon their own resources, upon the principle that if a man does not work neither shall he eat.

I come next to the reservation system. That has been a serious injury, not only to the progress of the Indian, but to that of the United States.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. LITTLE. I desire to ask if the gentleman has overlooked the present policy of the Department of Indian Affairs on the ration question, because we have now in force a policy that does not give rations to the Indians who are able to work, and compelling them to work for a living, and from the report of the Commissioner it will be found that from 12,000 to 15,000 have already been taken from the ration supply.

Mr. BURTON. I am very glad to hear the statement made.

Mr. LITTLE. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs states that if the policy is continued it has great promise of affording relief from the ration system.

Mr. BURTON. The statistics do not seem to prove that this new departure has been carried as far as it ought to be carried. The reports show that in numerous instances where tribes have wealth, where they receive large annuities, they are continuing to receive their regular rations from the Government.

Mr. LITTLE. I am not prepared to dispute the proposition that it has not been carried far enough, but in his last annual report the Commissioner makes this statement:

As a first result over 12,000 have been dropped from the ration roll, being wholly self-supporting. As a second result a large number of Indians have been put to work, or work has been found for them.

Then he goes on and gives statements of agents in respect to that work. I think it is a desirable plan. I think it ought to be pushed. I think it is not only fair and just and humane to the Indian, but is also of benefit to the Government.

Mr. BURTON. Now, as to the reservation system. These immense areas are a barrier to the progress of the United States, and that of the Indians as well. In the first place they promote nomadic habits. The instant that you give to a thousand persons

2,000,000 acres what would they do? Is it an incitement to agriculture and the peaceful methods of industrial life? No. It is the very ground for a continuance of a disposition to live by hunting and by fishing. Then, again, the Indian is forbidden the privilege of going off his reservation, and the white man is forbidden to go on it. This keeps him out of contact with the march of civilized life. It is said that the reservations are in remote corners of the country. There are no remote corners in the United States.

There is no locality across which the pathway of civilization does not lie. Everywhere roads should be constructed and development begun. Great progress has been made in promoting the allotment of lands to the Indians, and I think the present Committee on Indian Affairs should be commended. I include not only the two gentlemen I have named, but all other members on the committee. I trust that more will be done along this line, but it seems to me the system can still be criticised, because the Department clings too closely to the old ideas of immense reservations and tribal organizations.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does not the gentleman think it would be wise and advisable to open all Indian reservations to the miners of the country so that they can go on the reservations and locate the mines and develop them? At the present time they are locked up.

Mr. BURTON. I would say that the utmost care should be taken to be just to the Indians and also to be just to the whole people, so that no particular locality or individual will gain an undue share of the advantage to be derived from these mining properties.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does not the gentleman think it would be impossible to take advantage of the Indians if the land were opened up under the United States mining laws, which have been well guarded and are the result of a century of legislation?

Mr. BURTON. I believe in anything that opens up these reservations of the Indians to civilization. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has ten minutes remaining.

Mr. BURTON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak in regard to the school system. "We must educate," said Horace Mann; "We must educate." Anything in the line of education appeals to the American people, because it is regarded as the corner stone of our progress. But it would seem that the plans adopted for the Indians are very faulty and expensive. In the first place, let me call attention to some figures taken from the Indian Commissioner's reports, taking first those who are able to read. Exclusive of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, the number who could read in 1881 was 13,578; in 1891, 27,157; in 1901, 46,044—a very gratifying increase it is true.

But what has it cost? From 1882 to 1891, inclusive, it cost $10,000,000. From 1892 to 1901 it cost about $25,000,000. So that for every one who learned to read during the ten years from 1891 to 1901 between $1,300 and $1,400 was expended by the United States Government.

In 1901 there were enrolled in the schools something over 27,000 pupils, and the average attendance was over 23,000. Presumably every one that was enrolled has learned to read, and we are forced to this conclusion, that 8,000 more are now enrolled in the schools than learned to read in the ten years from 1891 to 1901. Or, if we examine with a view to criticising, it would seem that 8,000 of those who learned to read in 1891 have to be kept in school to this day in order to retain the knowledge they possessed at that time. This enormous expense did not begin until after the year 1881.

In 1877 the total amount expended for education was $20,000; in 1881, $75,000; in 1891, $1,842,000. It has been increasing very rapidly in the last few years, except the present bill has a slight reduction. For the year 1903 the appropriation was $3,531,000.

There are three or four kinds of schools: First, the nonreservation school, like that at Carlisle, Pa.; second, the boarding school on the reservation, and, third, the day school on the reservation. The difference between the day school and the reservation's boarding school is that in the latter the pupil stays during the school months of the year in the reservation boarding house and is fed and clothed there, while in the day school he only takes a lunch at school. There is still another plan under which the Indian youth are educated in white schools on condition that payment shall be made. The number thus educated is quite small.

Now, Mr. Chairman, several of these nonreservation schools would no doubt be helpful to the Indian. What is the number? There are 25 or 30 scattered all over the country, extending from Pennsylvania and North Carolina to California and Oregon. In almost every bill some ambitious State brings in a request to have another nonreservation school located within its borders. I seriously question whether this is the best way to educate the Indian. They are often cajoled and almost forced to go from their homes thousands of miles to the nonreservation boarding school. For the most advanced scholar, for those who show unusual aptitude, such a school is a proper reward, but to send them indiscriminately from all over the country and without regard to their qualifications is a very serious blunder. There are certain things which can only be learned at the home and by the fireside. The family is not a conventional arrangement; it is a divinely ordained institution. When you sever the Indian from home, place him in strange surroundings, keep him there and then send him back, the probabilities are that he will either be out of line with his environment or that he will be ridiculed or thrown out by his tribe. He has not attained the civilization of the race with which he must compete, and he does not harmonize with that to which he was born.

Now, as regards the reservation boarding school, I question very much its benefits. Indian children are taken away from their families and boarded, clothed, and instructed at the school at public expense. That which is not prized will not be utilized. We all know the effect of the American school. The child goes home at night and talks with his parents about his studies. An impetus is given to him in the school to communicate thus with them. On the other hand, the affection and interest of his parents give him a spur to do his best. All this is lacking for the child who is separated from his family.

There is one point in this connection which I should like to elaborate more at length, but with the consent of the committee I will print some tables and accompanying material in the RECORD. These will tend to show that in many places where these schools have been maintained with the greatest care and for the longest time, habits of industry have been on the decrease rather than on the increase.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to enlarge my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the gentleman will have that leave.

There was no objection.

Following are the tables:

The agent states that the positions of carpenter and blacksmith have been discontinued at this agency, and no bad results have been remarked. These mechanical branches of the Government tended to make the Indians more dependent upon the Government, and without free repairing they are more careful. Also much property of white men was brought in for repair by Indians. (See Report of Secretary of Interior, Indian affairs, 1901, part 1, p. 352.)

Indian agent reports these Indians are advantageously situated, and there is no reason why they should not be self-supporting.

The Indian agent reports (see Annual Report of Department of the Interior, Indian Affairs, 1901, part 1, page 335), that "The Sauk and Fox tribe of Indians are a wealthy people." (Total number, 473.) "They receive $94,000 per annum in annuities and about $18,000 rentals from their allotments. This with their natural antipathy to work tends to make them indolent and very few of them work to any extent. * * * As long as annuities are paid them, and with their lease money, is sufficient for their maintenance they will not progress. The Iowa Indians spend most of their time visiting other tribes and drinking liquor."

Among the tribes or agencies referred to in the above tables, it will be noted, are some which receive large grants from the Government in the way of gratuities, some which have large reservations of land, and other which receive annual interest on trust funds.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I have endeavored to select tribes or agencies in such a way that there will not be any discrimination against any one of five or six States and Territories, in all of which there is a showing of this kind. It appears that the Shoshones and Arapahoes, whose school was established in 1879, showed a percentage of 25 per cent in 1891, who subsisted by labor in civilized pursuits, but after ten years of further schooling this percentage dropped more than half. Next we come to the Indians at the Pottawatomie and Great Nemaha Agency. Here the school was established in 1871. In the ten years from 1891 to 1901 the percentage subsisting by labor and civilized pursuits dropped from 75 per cent to 30 per cent, while those subsisting by cash annuities, etc., increased from 25 per cent to 70 per cent. Everyone will admit that for such a race such as the Indian that which is most needful is that he may adjust himself to civilization by habits of industry and by doing for himself.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KLEBERG. I move that the gentleman's time be extended for ten minutes, or until he has time to conclude his remarks.

Mr. BURTON. I certainly shall not occupy more than ten minutes more.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand that the gentleman had for his side one hour and thirty minutes. If no other gentleman desires to occupy the thirty minutes, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio be permitted to occupy so much of the thirty minutes as he may desire.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] was allotted thirty minutes. Does he yield?

Mr. SHERMAN. I was not here when the agreement was made. Was not the gentleman from Ohio to have an hour and a half under his control?

The CHAIRMAN. One hour; and one-half hour was to be controlled by the gentleman from New York, who can, if he wishes, yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman some little time, if he desires.

Mr. BURTON. I think that ten minutes will be all that I wish.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall be very glad to yield the gentleman ten minutes.

Mr. BURTON. The worst showing of all is that made by the Indians at the Sauk and Fox Agency in Oklahoma. Here a school was established in 1868, upon which was expended something over $20,000 both in 1891 and in 1901. The number subsisting by civilized pursuits in 1891 was 84 per cent, while 16 per cent subsisted by hunting and fishing. In 1901 20 per cent only subsisted by labor in civilized pursuits, while 80 per cent obtained their support from Government rations and lease moneys. The remarks of the Indian agent quoted above throw a great deal of light upon the situation at this agency.

The natural inference to be framed from these illustrations, which are of sufficient number to prevent their being regarded as isolated cases, is that the prevalent method of Indian education stimulates a desire to live without work and by Government bounty rather than by industry.

The very large wealth of some of the Indian tribes will attract our attention. The following is a statement of the condition of the Osage Indians, the wealthiest of the tribes:

[Report 1901, p. 326.]

OSAGE INDIANS, OKLAHOMA.

Number in tribe, 1,788.

Income:
Interest of Kansas lands sold, 5 per cent	$413,557.16
Rental on pastures	138,296.08
Permit tax, gross tax, etc	8,945.00
Interest on money on deposit	3,456.00
Total	564,254.24
Average per capita, per annum, over	315.00

Moneys derived from rental of pastures are to be divided whenever there is $100,000 or more on hand.

Quantity of land owned, 1,590,195 acres, some of which is worth $50 per acre, and the average value is said to be not less than $5 per acre. The per capita wealth of each member of tribe, capitalizing investment funds at 5 per cent and adding the value of their lands, exceeds $9,000. Yet in 1901, 23 members of this tribe were boarded, clothed, and maintained at Carlisle school, and their transportation expenses paid, all at Government expense.

In speaking of the Indians at the Pottawatomie and Great Nemaha Agency in Kansas, the agent states that the public valuation of lands and trust funds held by the Government makes these Indians worth $4,000 apiece or $20,000 a family, and he goes on to say, as set forth above, that this very fact causes these Indians to be idle and thriftless. I am informed that the Potawatomies pay the whole or a portion of the expense of their schools, but in most cases the money is paid by the United States.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How many of these Indians are there altogether?

Mr. BURTON. The gentleman from Tennessee asks me as to the number of these Indians. In 1900, exclusive of Alaska, there were 237,196; in 1890 there were 248,253. Of these there were in the Indian Territory in 1900, 52,500; in 1890, 51,279.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How many of them are now civilized?

Mr. BURTON. That is a question which I suppose it is impossible to answer. I think the number would most naturally include those who have lived in association with the whites, or who are living on allotted lands.

In this connection there is one tribe, the Stockbridge Indians, of Wisconsin, which is worthy of attention. It appears that all the members of this tribe sustain themselves by civilized labor, but they were among the very first to have their lands allotted in severalty.

Now, what are some practical suggestions looking to an improvement of our Indian policy? First, we ought to have more adequate statistical information. In 1875 a statute was passed directing the Secretary of the Interior on the 1st of November of every year to give a tabular statement of each appropriation of the previous year, setting forth how the amount had been expended. In the official list of executive documents to be transmitted to Congress this is included. I can not find that any such document has been furnished. Anyone who desires to study the condition of Indian tribes and ascertain what disposition of moneys has been made, must search through a multitude of tables. In some of these tables they are classified by tribes, in others by agencies; and it is with the very greatest difficulty that ready and accurate information can be obtained.

Next, closer care and supervision about the issuing of rations; the enforcement of a rule contained in the statute of 1875, that an Indian should not receive rations unless he did work for his tribe or for himself to an amount equal to the value of the rations issued to him.

Next, the breaking up of the reservations. It may be necessary to provide that the Indian allottee, to protect him against imposition, shall not be allowed to dispose of his lands until some time after he has acquired individual ownership, but it can not be questioned that tribal ownership has kept back the Indian race and proved a barrier to its development.

Next, a closer scrutiny of these schools, confining them to the essentials of education, and, most of all, keeping in view the all-important object of inculcating habits of industry.

Why, I looked over the report of the school superintendent, which lays out a six years' course in agriculture, and gravely gives a number of pedagogical platitudes as instructions to teachers. There are some extracts. For the first year it says:

> Do not restrain the natural curiosity of the child and his tendency to ask questions.

The second year they should have some light work to do, "such as shelling corn for the fowls." In the third year they are advanced enough to "drive the cattle." In the fourth year such progress will have been made that the pupil can be told of the necessity of keeping the place free from weeds. The next year they are to be taught the meaning of "capillary attraction." There is the reason, Mr. Chairman, why so many farmers have been unsuccessful, and that we have had such knocking at the doors of Congress for appropriations for the irrigation of arid lands. It is because the farmers do not understand capillary attraction. [Laughter.] In the sixth year it says:

> Show that a number of dogs consume, and do not tend to add to, the revenue of the family. Endeavor to lead him (the pupil) to independence.

Teach him independence in the sixth year when for five years you have been destroying all independence and preventing him from forming habits of self-reliance by keeping him in this kind of tutelage.

The American boy is surrounded by those who are competent to teach, but he is expected to see some things and learn some things for himself. He loves to spend his time in the clear sunlight, and is not penned up within the walls of a boarding school. He does not take his bath in a Government bath tub; he goes to the running brook and plunges in, eager, selfconfident, as though he were Lord of the water as well as the land. In the summer time he is up with the dawn and at the close of twilight falls into well-deserved repose. He early learns that self-reliance which is the beginning of a useful citizen. He will be the strongest factor in our citizenship, because from his very boyhood he is taught to work and depend upon himself. When grown to manhood he will be the chief reliance of his people, and when days are dark and statesmen tremble he will be the first to respond if the tocsin of alarm is sounded. He will not leave his country defenseless.

Amid surroundings which are lowly and toilsome beyond the common lot, he can look to the splendid array of presidents, generals, and men successful in the commercial world who were born upon the farm with hopes that for his children broader fields may open, and that they may enjoy a position in this free Republic, prouder than the kings of old. Thus, you may say to him in the language of the witch to Banquo:

> Thou shalt get kings, though thou be none.

[Applause.]

Now, if we do our duty to the Indian we will give him something of the selfsame reliance. We will build up his manhood as well. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I have enjoyed very much indeed, as I believe all the members of the committee have, the full and logical and chronological and eloquent speech of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON]. He has demonstrated, as he always does when he takes the floor, that he has studied his subject and understands of what he speaks. He has placed before us a goal which he thinks we should eventually reach in arriving at the millennium of the Indian problem. He sees a goal, Mr. Chairman, which men who have devoted days and weeks and years of thought to the study of the Indian problem saw many years ago, a goal which this Government through its proper officials has been struggling to reach, and which, please God, we may some time yet attain.

It can not be reached in a month, in a year, I fear not in one or two generations or more—perhaps never. The red man is nomadic. The Indian is not naturally a domestic person. He is a wild man, a warrior, a fighter, a hunter. His blood for generations has been the blood not of a domestic person, but of a man who has enjoyed fighting, enjoyed warfare, enjoyed wildness; who has lived a life not by the toil to which the white man resorts to attain his livelihood, but by hunting and fishing—by pursuits which to the white man are considered purely and solely recreation, sport.

The gentleman criticises the general policy of the Government; and the officials of the Government recognize and have recognized for many years that the criticism is fairly just, and have been struggling to reach that point where this criticism no longer has ground. The gentleman suggested in the early part of his remarks that the Indian appropriation bill is very much the same year after year; and let me thank the gentleman for his commendation of the individual members of the committee, and let me add to his commendation, which was confined to the gentleman from Kansas and myself, the commendation of the various members of the committee on both sides of this Chamber.

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that in all the years in which I have been upon that committee I have no recollection of partisanship governing the action of the members. It is a committee which has attempted to do its full duty without thought of upon which side of the Chamber members sat or to which party the different members belonged. The gentleman from Ohio suggested that the Indian appropriation bill year after year is much the same. That is true. Is it not also true, Mr. Chairman, that the legislative appropriation bill, the Post-Office appropriation bill, and all the various other appropriation bills are much the same? Not the river and harbor bill—there are many more changes in that.

And, Mr. Chairman, it must be so, because a large proportion of the appropriations carried by the Indian appropriation bill are for moneys which the Government has agreed to pay to the various Indian tribes, some of them covering a period of perpetuity and others a period of ten, twenty, or thirty years. It is so because we have inaugurated a policy in reference to agencies which has changed only as to personnel. The bill itself differs with reference to the agencies to this extent: That whereas ten years ago we appropriated for sixty odd, we now appropriate for forty. I think the gentleman on second thought will hardly think that criticism of the Indian appropriation bill is a just one.

The gentleman rightly defends the white men of this nation against the sweeping and unjust criticism that has been made of them affecting their relations with the red tribes of this country. I agree with the gentleman that this Government for more than a hundred years has been liberal beyond justice to the Indian tribes, has been generous at times, as the gentleman indicates, to a fault in their treatment of the red man. Mr. Chairman, I think partially the allegations of deceit and of fraud arise from the fact that we are dealing with a people who are not only ignorant of our language but ignorant of almost everything else, and it arises from a mistaken idea of statements, of promises, sometimes made by intelligent people to those who understand only by signs.

The gentleman from Ohio bases his criticism of the policy of the Government upon three propositions, as I understand—rations, reservations, and education.

Now, Mr. Chairman, so far as the rations are concerned, the greater part of the rations which we furnish the Indians to-day are furnished under treaty obligations which we must respect. The amount that is covered by treaty in the last appropriation bill was $3,000,000; in this present bill something over $2,000,000. The amount for miscellaneous support, which is for gratuities, in the last bill was $750,000 and in this bill $675,000. The gentleman from Ohio does not object, he states, to the issuance of rations to the poor or the decrepid, or to those who for any reason are unable to maintain themselves or to obtain their food by the sweat of of their brow, as the gentleman said.

Mr. Chairman, the committee asks the House in no case to appropriate to provide rations for the Indians except in cases where a treaty of this country provides for it, and except in cases where such conditions as the gentleman describes exist. Where the Indians go to the agencies in their carriages for their rations, they go for rations which have been promised them by the American Government, and in no way are they gratuities. They are gratuities where the people are old and decrepit, or where they are so located that no living thing except a prairie dog or ant can exist.

I wish the gentleman might spend a little time in going over some of the Indian reservations in this country, and then tell me for how long he thinks a white man could support himself upon 160 or 1,060 acres of such land. Take, for instance, the Navaho Reservation—large in area, a reservation set aside for a large and important Indian tribe—thousands and thousands of acres where not one spear of grass grows.

Mr. Chairman, in order to reach Fort Defiance, which is the agency headquarters of the Navaho Reservation, you ride 35 miles from the railroad, and for that entire distance of 35 miles, all but 3 or 4 on the Indian reservation, not a spear of grass grows, not a drop of water runs, and not a drop of rain has fallen for nearly four years. Tell me how anybody can live on such land as that. To be sure, some portions of the Navaho Reservation do produce something, but the land upon which the Indian is expected to support himself, Mr. Chairman, is land upon which the average white man of the world would be unable to subsist for one-quarter of the time that the Indian lives upon it.

The question of rations to the Indians, the distribution of rations to them, and its effect upon them, is not a new one for the consideration by the Commissioner, or by the Secretary of the Interior, or those having in charge the Indian affairs. It has been a living question for twenty years. During the last two years there has been applied a new policy—that of compelling the Indians, where it is possible to do so under the terms of their treaty, to earn by their own labor the rations which are dealt out to them, and where an Indian refuses to work to withhold their rations. I will not detain the committee by reading at length, but I will print in my remarks a page or two, or three, of the report of the Commissioner on Indian Affairs, submitted to Congress when it convened in December, and which states in detail all that has been done and what progress has been made in this new system of issuing rations only to such Indians as perform labor therefor. It is as follows:

OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., October 16, 1902.

SIR: The Seventy-first Annual Report of the Office of Indian Affairs is respectfully submitted.

PRECEPT AND PRACTICE.

Cutting off rations.—In previous reports some space was given to the discussion of the Indian's progress and the difficulties to be overcome on his way to civilzation. It was pointed out that among the obstacles to his self-support the first and perhaps the principal one was the then prevailing ration system, which was justly condemned as encouraging idleness, with its attendant vices, and as foreign in its results to the very purpose for which it was designed.

At the same time, while an evil, it was admitted to be a necessary evil, to be endured only while the Indian was learning the art of self-support, or at least put in a way where, by the exercise of ordinary industry, he could support himself. The continuance, however, of the practice of the indiscriminate issue of rations to all alike, with regard to their worldly condition, was earnestly opposed, and it was laid down as a correct rule of action that only the old and helpless should be supported, while the able-bodied, if not already self-supporting, should be given the opportunity to work and should then be required to take care of themselves.

Faith without works is dead. Realizing this the office set to work to show by its acts the sincerity of its belief.

And here it is proper to say that this change in the manner of dealing with the Indians was not a hasty conception on the part of the office. Indeed, it was not new at all. It has been the hope and desire of enlightened men for many years. But inasmuch as it has been the subject of some harsh criticism and severe condemnation, and as the Indian Office has been freely charged with ignorance and blunders, it is simply fair that the motives which governed it and the principles which actuated it should be known and understood in order that the public may form an intelligent judgment on the matters involved. For this purpose it is necessary to go over some familiar ground and give it a somewhat extended notice.

The present movement began some two years ago, and arose out of a communication from chiefs and headmen of the Sioux Indians of the Rosebud Agency. About October, 1900, they addressed a letter to the President representing that they were the headmen of the Sioux Indians of Rosebud Agency and represented the tribe; that under the "Black Hills treaty" of 1876 they were to be given certain rations; that these rations had been cut down from time to time until they were getting much less than the amount stated in that agreement; that they were hungry most of the time, especially the old and the crippled, and that before the winter was over they would suffer very much; that in former years they could make some money by freighting, but as their annuity goods had been taken away, a large part of their freighting had fallen off; that in years past they got the hides from the beef cattle killed for issue, which were a great help in procuring things to eat; that they would obtain more benefit from the hides if issued to them direct than if they were sold and the money paid to them once a year; that they needed the hides to make moccasins and covering for their beds, etc.; that as they got little freighting and no beef hides, and were unable to raise much on their land, they had to depend on the rations issued by the Great Father; that while they wanted to obey his orders, yet they could not sit down and see their people starve; that they had talked many times with their agent, who was powerless to do anything without the authority of his superiors, and that they would like to have some assurance that something would be done for their relief. They therefore asked the President to answer them through their agent and tell them if he could help their people.

Recognizing that the tone of that letter was probably symptomatic of the feeling then pervading the Sioux people generally, and that the conditions at Rosebud were similar to those existing at the other Sioux agencies, and further, that the action taken with regard to the Sioux would have an important bearing upon other tribes similarly situated, the office, with a view of contributing to the better understanding of the matters referred to, submitted to the Department, along with the Indians' letter to go to the President, a communication treating of the Sioux Nation as a whole. That communication, after reciting the substance of the Indians' letter, took up the consideration of the Black Hills treaty, the true intent and meaning of which has been the subject of so much contention, and quoted the articles of that agreement relating to the matters under discussion, as follows:

"ART. 4. The Government of the United States and the said Indians, being mutually desirous that the latter shall be located in a country where they may eventually become self-supporting and acquire the arts of civilized life, it is therefore agreed that the said Indians shall select a delegation of five or more chiefs and principal men from each band, who shall, without delay, visit the Indian Territory, under the guidance and protection of suitable persons, to be appointed for that purpose by the Department of the Interior, with a view to selecting therein a permanent home for the said Indians.

"If such delegation shall make a selection which shall be satisfactory to themselves, the people whom they represent, and to the United States, then the said Indians agree that they will remove to the country so selected within one year from this date.

"And the said Indians do further agree that in all things to submit themselves to such beneficient plans as the Government may provide for them in the selection of a country suitable for a permanent home, where they may live like white men.

"ART. 5. In consideration of the foregoing cession of territory and rights, and upon full compliance with each and every obligation assumed by the said Indians, the United States does agree to provide all necessary aid to assist the said Indians in the work of civilization; to furnish them schools and instruction in mechanical and agricultural arts, as provided for by the treaty of 1868.

"Also to provide the said Indians with subsistence consisting of a ration for each individual of a pound and a half of beef (or in lieu thereof one-half pound of bacon), one-half pound of flour, and one-half pound of corn; and for every 100 rations, 4 pounds of coffee, 8 pounds of sugar, and 3 pounds of beans, or in lieu of said articles the equivalent thereof, in the discretion of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

"Such rations, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be continued until the Indians are able to support themselves.

"Rations shall, in all cases, be issued to the head of each separate family; and whenever schools shall have been provided by the Government for said Indians, no rations shall be issued for children between the ages of 6 and 14 years (the sick and infirm excepted) unless such children shall regularly attend school.

"Whenever the said Indians shall be located upon lands which are suitable for cultivation, rations shall be issued only to the persons and families of those persons who labor (the aged, sick, and infirm excepted); and as an incentive to industrious habits the Commissioner of Indian Affairs may provide that such persons be furnished in payment for their labor such other necessary articles as are requisite for civilized life.

"The Government will aid said indians as far as possible in finding a market for their surplus productions, and in finding employment, and will purchase such surplus, as far as may be required for supplying food to those Indians, parties to this agreement, who are unable to sustain themselves; and will also employ Indians, so far as practicable, in the performance of Government work upon their reservations."

It was then shown that the rations provided for the Sioux at the time were sufficient, unless the Indians were improvident, to prevent want. The letter then went on to say that the Sioux rations, as well as the rations for all other tribes, had been gradually reduced; that this was in accordance with the policy of this office and the spirit of the Sioux agreement of 1877, and that the true intent and meaning of that agreement was forcibly expressed by a former Commissioner of Indian Affairs nearly ten years before. In writing to the Secretary of the Interior at that time in relation to the subsistence supplies issued to the Sioux, Commissioner Morgan quoted articles 4 and 5 of the agreement as they have already been given here, and then said:

"This agreement is still in force, and the questions now raised are questions as to how far the Government has kept its obligations.

"It is worthy of special note that the end aimed at in the agreement was the civilization of the Indians. They were to settle down permanently; their children were to be educated; they were to live like white men, and the rations issued to them, or so much as might be necessary, were to be continued until 'the Indians are able to support themselves.' It is clearly evident that the Government never intended that the Indians should look to it for continuous support; that no promises of this kind were ever made, and that the Indians themselves did not expect it, and apparently did not desire it. The object of the rations was not that the Indians might be fed by the Government, but simply that they might be assisted and kept from want during the period of their probation while they were learning the art of self-support.

"No one will question the wisdom of this policy. No intelligent man will doubt that the welfare of the Indian demands that just as soon as possible he shall be rendered self-supporting, and that any help in the way of food or other supplies furnished him by the Government in excess of his absolute needs so as to remove from him the spur and stimulus to labor is not a kindness, but an injury.

"The only serious question which can be raised in this connection is, how long a time are these rations to be continued and under what circumstances the Government shall reduce or discontinue them.

"It should be noted that the agreement expressly stipulates that—

"'Whenever the said Indians shall be located upon lands which are suitable for cultivation, rations shall be issued only to the persons and families of those persons who labor (the aged, sick, and infirm excepted); and as an incentive to industrious habits the Commissioner of Indian Affairs may provide that such persons be furnished in payment for their labor such other necessary articles as are requisite for civilized life.'

"It certainly will be accepted as a truism that the Government had a right to demand of the Indians that they put forth for self-support whatever efforts might reasonably be demanded of them considering their nature and surroundings. It will also be admitted that, considering the end in view, it would be a humane act on the part of the Government to decrease the rations, even though such decrease should bring temporary hardship, provided such hardship should serve as a stimulus to labor and self-help. Of course no one would urge that the Indians should be starved. In fact all that can be demanded, either in fulfillment of treaty obligation or as an act of justice or humanity, is this, that the Indians shall put forth all proper exertion in the way of gaining a livelihood by their own labor as other men are forced to do, and that in connection with such effort on their part food supplies shall be issued to them in such quantities (not exceeding the amounts named in the agreement) and for such length of time as a sincere regard for the highest welfare of the Indians shall dictate."

The remainder of the letter was devoted to showing that the Sioux Indians, aside from rations, had received annually during the thirty years previous a suit of clothing or material to make it; that they had also received a large number of beneficial articles, such as agricultural implements, fence wire, building material, etc., for which $5,480,200 had been appropriated during the thirty years the treaty was alive; that they received the proceeds of the sale of hides derived from beef cattle; that they get more benefit from them this way than the other; that they were receiving 5 per cent annually on $3,000,000 in the Treasury, one-half in education and one-half in cash; that they had received since 1890, 20,000 cows and 900 bulls; that at the time of that writing they possessed over 88,000 head of cattle; that they were able to sell that year probably 5,850 head to the Government to be issued back. In passing it may be interesting to observe that within the last thirty-three years there has been appropriated for the benefit of the Sioux nearly $60,000,000 for the purposes named.

This was forwarded to the President by the Secretary of the Interior in a letter dated November 26, 1900, which is referred to and partially quoted in his last annual report, the conclusion of which was that the time had come for Indians either to support themselves or at least to furnish a part of their support; and this conclusion was heartily approved by the President.

It then being winter it was not considered judicious to make any immediate change in the prevailing policy, and so the issue of rations was continued as usual the remainder of that fiscal year. Before the next fiscal year opened, however, steps were taken to carry out the views expressed. On June 20, 1901, a letter was addressed to the Sioux agents, which, as it is the first enunciation of the future policy to be pursued, is given in full:

"DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
"OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
"Washington, June 20, 1901.

"SIR: As the next fiscal year is approaching, when new arrangements will go into effect for the support and civilization of your Indians, it is a proper time to address you on the subject of the issuance of rations to the Indians on the Sioux reservations.

"As you are doubtless aware, this subject has had the earnest attention of those who are actively engaged in the Indian service as well as those who, though not connected with it in an official capacity, sympathize in the work, and the almost universal opinion is that the indiscriminate issue of rations is a hindrance rather than a help to the Indians.

"The fact is recognized that a majority of your Indians, perhaps a large majority, are unable to support themselves, even if they would, except only partially, and therefore must be subsisted wholly or in part as contemplated by the agreement of 1877. On the other hand, it is a well-known fact that a large number of persons classed as Indians have profited by the assistance they have received from the Government and are now not only beyond want, but in many instances are prosperous, and often affluent. How many of these there are is not known to this office, but it is certain that having reached the stage of self-support they are no longer entitled to the ration prescribed by the agreement referred to.

"In order that there may be no misunderstanding as to the meaning of this, the earnest attention of your Indians is invited to a correspondence that took place last fall. In October, 1900, the office received a letter signed by Sioux Indians of the Rosebud Agency, addressed to the President, relative to their condition, their prospects, and their needs. They referred to the Black Hills agreement of 1877, the reduction that had been made in the ration prescribed thereby, the loss of income by reduced freighting, their inability to raise much upon their land, and asked the President to answer them through their agent and tell them if he could help their people.

"This letter was forwarded to the honorable Secretary of the Interior with a brief report as to the number of the Sioux, the benefits and meaning of the so-called Black Hills treaty, the rations provided for the current year, the disposition of hides, the income from their trust fund, the number of cattle they were able to sell the Government to be issued back again, and other particulars relating to their welfare.

"The Secretary of the Interior transmitted the Indians' letter to the President on the 26th of November last, together with the report of this office, and after referring briefly to the several items of that report referring to the Rosebud Indians in particular, became more general and said:

"'Article 5 of the treaty of 1876, known as the Black Hills treaty with the Great Sioux Nation (of which the Rosebud Indians are a part), which was ratified by the act of Congress approved February 28, 1877 (19 Stat., 254), provides for assistance for the said Indians in the work of civilization; to furnish them schools and instruction in mechanical and agricultural pursuits; also a certain prescribed ration, which ration, "or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be continued until the Indians are able to support themselves."

"'From the representations made by the writers of the communication referred to, it does not seem that they or the other Indians of the Rosebud Agency are any nearer the goal of self-support than they were twenty-four years ago, when the treaty was made. Regardless of the provisions in the treaty looking to the reduction in the ration as they become able partly, if not wholly, to sustain themselves, which they appear to be able to do, and notwithstanding the facts stated by the Commissioner that individual Indians of this band own nearly 20,000 head of cattle, and that more than 1,500 head were purchased from them last year, at a cost to the Government of more than $50,000, which cattle were afterwards issued to and eaten up by the band, they still claim full benefits under the treaty named.'"

"He concluded his letter by saying—and this is commended to the serious consideration of your Indians:

"'From the facts stated, it does seem that the time has come when individual Indians who are so well qualified to at least furnish a part of their own support, as some of these Indians seem to be, should be required to take upon themselves a portion of the burden of their own care. The Government has faithfully and well fulfilled its obligations to them, and as the treaty of 1876 is mutual in its provisions, I respectfully recommend that such individuals as are known to be able to do so, be required to furnish their own support, or at least to contribute toward it, so that the Government may be relieved of their care, and the spirit of the treaty of 1876, in that respect, carried into effect by them as well as by the Government, and that answer to this effect be communicated to them through their agent, as requested.'"

"It is understood that this matter received the earnest attention of the President and that he gave the Secretary's letter, just quoted, his unqualified approval.

"In the face of this the indiscriminate issue of rations to all alike must stop.

"It therefore becomes your first duty to go over the ration rolls of your agency and erase therefrom all those who are wholly self-supporting. Your next duty will be to regulate the ration issued to the necessities of the recipients. As now practiced, it is understood that rations are issued to all alike—that is, they are distributed equally among the Indians of your reservation without regard to their worldly possessions. This should not be continued longer. Many families are, perhaps, partially self-supporting, but in different degrees. In such cases the ration should be issued according to the particular needs.

"In determining who shall receive rations one important consideration must not be overlooked. Rations must not be issued to those who have no disposition to attempt to support themselves. The law and regulations to this effect are old, but in many cases seem to have been honored more in the breach than in the observance. Nevertheless, they are good, and should be enforced so far as conditions will allow.

"The office is unable to lay down any particular rule for the guidance of agents in arriving at correct conclusions in these matters. Indeed, an arbitrary rule would not work satisfactorily. In some cases it will not be a difficult task to determine who is self-supporting, in others it undoubtedly will. Neither will it be easy at all times to determine just to what extent a family or an individual should be assisted. In all cases it will be a matter of judgment in which that of the agent will or should largely predominate.

"The duty herein prescribed is an onerous one, and affecting as it does so deeply the present and future welfare of those under your charge, you will recognize the propriety of bringing to its discharge the most impartial, conscientious care. If the assistance of this office is needed, it will be given for the asking.

"It is possible that some of those who are able to support themselves may voluntarily withdraw from the ration roll, and thus contribute to the cause by their example. To the knowledge of this office there have been instances of this, and doubtless if the object to be obtained were properly presented there would be others.

"It is admitted that perhaps progress will be slow, but the time to begin it is here, and the object of this letter is to bring the Indians to a realizing sense of the attitude of the Government.

"At the proper time it is proposed to send you, as was done last year, a statement of the quantities of subsistence purchased for your Indians for the next fiscal year. They are believed to be ample for the needs of all who should receive rations if the spirit of this letter is observed.

"There is another class of Indians to whom the issue of rations would seem to be uncalled for. I refer to those drawing a salary from the Government. The number of these is large, many of them holding desirable positions, with very liberal salaries. A hasty examination of the salary list of the Sioux agencies shows that over 150 of the agency employees alone are Indians receiving salaries from $840 per annum down to $120, very few, however, of the latter. The majority of these earn as much as, if not more, year in and year out, than the average laborer of the country. There is no question in the mind of this office that the issue of rations to these should stop.

"There are also a large number employed in the schools with salaries from $300 down, besides quarters and other conveniences. The impression prevails here that many of these, if not all, draw rations. If so, the office can see no reason for the continuance of the practice.

"These two classes, therefore, should be eliminated from the ration roll.

"The Indian police are excepted from this ruling, as their salaries are very small and their duties are peculiar. There may be other exceptions to the rule. If so, the office will consider them on their merits.

"It is the desire of this office to have this new departure go into effect as soon after the beginning of the new fiscal year as possible.

"This letter has been addressed to the agents in charge of the Sioux of different tribes, except Santee."

Later on in September, 1901, a similar letter was sent to all other ration agencies on the ground that what was good for the Sioux was good for all, so that by the fall of 1901 all of the ration agencies were on the same basis with respect to the self-supporting.

While this was a step in the right direction, it did not remove the great evil to be overcome, which was the support of Indians in idleness. The extent and demoralizing effects of this evil were generally recognized and universally condemned, except, perhaps, by a mistaken philanthropy, which, ignoring the natural law that man must earn his living by the sweat of his brow, would exempt the Indian from labor and carry him upward on flowery beds of ease. Much had been said about this evil, and sporadic attempts had been made to check it, but with little avail. For years the Indians had been fed and clothed and allowed to spend their time in the devil's workshop.

It was felt that it was time for a change. Heretofore the dealing had been with the tribe; it would now be with the individual. He would no longer be looked upon simply as one of a dependent community to be dealt with as a whole, but would be considered independently and treated as one capable of developing those qualities which would lift him above the level of a pauper and fit him to become a useful member of society. His manhood would be appealed to. An attempt would be made to teach him self-reliance and self-respect. He would be induced to acquire habits of industry and to forsake the ways of idleness. Necessity, and necessity alone, would do this. He must want before he would work; he must come to the bitter realization that idleness and hunger go hand in hand, and understand that he must put his hand to the plow if he would live. His rations would therefore be stopped and he would be offered work instead; work that he could do; not aimless work, but work with an object; not made to dig a hole one day and fill it up the next simply for the sake of doing so; that would deprive labor of the very essence of its worth—a definite purpose. He would be put at something which would give him not only a present living, but which he could see would bring him benefit in the future. He would be paid fairly and promptly for his work, and then left to provide for himself.

Accordingly, in the early part of January of the present year agents were advised that rations would no longer be issued to the able-bodied, but that the money thus saved would be used to pay them in cash for labor in building roads, dams, or reservoirs for storage of water, or any other work that would give them profitable occupation for the present and lead to their self-support in the future. Men were to be paid $1.25 a day of eight hours, and men with teams $2.50. Not only were the agents to employ the Indians to the fullest extent themselves, but they were to use all of their influence in finding employment for them in the surrounding country; and it was suggested to them that they should devote the greater part of their time to the civilization of their Indians, leaving the minor details of administration to subordinates, and that an Indian agency should be a bureau for employment of Indians rather than a center for the gratuitous distribution of supplies.

As this has been the subject of considerable animadversion and been stigmatized as a plan for the encouragement of contract labor, it is proper that some particular notice should be taken of these strictures, and the false charges refuted. As to the assertion that the plan is to hire out adult male Indians as contract laborers, nothing can be farther from the truth. In all the correspondence there is not even a hint of such a thing. It was simply suggested to agents that they should circulate the information in the surrounding country that laborers could be obtained at their agencies, if such were the fact. If they could not give the Indians work themselves, they were to find it for them if they could. And that was their plain duty. If reference is made to the Black Hills treaty, already quoted, it will be seen that the Government obligates itself to aid the Sioux Indians in finding employment. The agents, therefore, in publishing the fact that there were Indians willing to work, were simply carrying out both the letter and spirit of that agreement.

In all of this there was not the slightest suggestion of hiring the Indian out under contract. That implies coercion. There was not a thought of such a thing. He was to be given an opportunity to work, that was all. If the Government did not have it, it was to find it for him. He could work or not, as he chose. He was as much a free agent with respect to this as anyone else. Only if he were given the opportunity to work and refused, he was not to expect to be supported by the Government.

The new policy was received with much discontent in some quarters, and passive if not open opposition in others. There were a few mutterings and a good deal of talk about vested rights, some sympathetic expressions over the hard lot of poor Lo, and here and there a prophesy of an "uprising." Interested parties endeavored to create a sentiment against it, while self-constituted conservators of the Indian either cast aspersions upon its authors or damned it with faint praise.

In spite of these and other adverse influences, the office persevered with its policy and is now in a position to form an intelligent idea of its effect.

Everywhere the results have been favorable even beyond expectation. Misgiving in some quarters has given place to confidence, and while, perhaps, the experimental stage has not been passed, there is every reason to believe that the final success of the plan, if carried out judiciously, is assured.

As a first result over 12,000 have been dropped from the ration roll, being wholly self-supporting. As a second result a large number of Indians have been put to work, or work has been found for them. As to the effect of this let others speak.

One agent writes:

"The Indians are eager for work, even some of the older ones, classed by the physicians as physically unable to work, insisting on having work. * * * These Indians are working as faithfully and intelligently as could be expected of people who have never had occasion to work for their support, and there can be no question as to the wisdom of the new policy and its good effect on these people."

Another says:

"The results so far are very gratifying. * * * As soon as the fact that work could be secured was known by the tribe, applications came faster than they could be employed. One man, over 50 years of age, when drawing his pay for a few days' work, acknowledged it was the first money he ever earned, and seemed pleased that it was possible to secure money without waiting for annuity or lease payments. * * * There is no question but that the time was ripe for the adoption of the present policy."

Another:

"I think this new policy has had a very desirable and stimulating effect upon these Indians to look for employment, while a great many of them are always ready to work when they can see that they are to be compensated for it; yet they seem now to be more anxious for work than ever before."

Another:

"We have succeeded beyond our most sanguine expectations. Over 300 have been secured employment outside of the Government work. They are employed on the railroad, by ranchmen, in cutting wood, shearing sheep, and other minor occupations. They are paid by the railroad $1.50 per day; by ranchmen $30 per month and board; for chopping wood, $1 per cord; shearing sheep, 7 cents per head, and other labor in proportion. * * * The result of all this is that the Indians have lived better than ever before. * * * No one has suffered by the reduction of rations; but, on the other hand, there has been less discontent and complaint than I have ever before known. * * * In conclusion, I beg to recommend that the present policy of handling the Indians at this agency be continued."

And still another:

"I could have secured employment for practically all the able-bodied Indians in this agency if they would have accepted it. * * * Some of these pretended friends of the Indians, instead of encouraging them to accept this work, even at small wages, have been assiduously trying to discourage them from going. * * * Concerning those who did go to work off the reservation, I would say that they gave perfect satisfaction to their employers, who have informed me that they would rather have them than white laborers. * * * The general effect on the Indians of the work done on the reservation has been a very good one. It has been very satisfactory from all standpoints."

An inspector says:

"Above all else I believe the best lesson an able-bodied Indian can have is to convince him that he must work or starve. If he complains that there is no work to do, the Government should be prepared for him with labor on roads, irrigating ditches, coal fields, lumber camps, etc. For such work let him be paid a moderate sum in cash. To pay in rations or to pay more than the Indian earns are both errors which experience has proven should not be repeated. But if the Indian says he is hungry, let him be shown the 'Government wood pile' and be compelled to work his way through it."

A superintendent of thirty years' experience writes:

"Your letters * * * point toward the fact that the Indian Office expects in the near future to discontinue the gratuitous issue of rations. Any time during the last twenty years I would have hailed this step as a boon to these Indians. * * * The policy of the Government in issuing so much to them gratuitously has dwarfed their energies, cultivated their dependence, and encouraged their extravagance. After thirty years of issuing gratuitous rations, after distributing many carloads of farming implements, wire for fencing, and wagons and harness, after receiving two cash annuity payments, * * * these Indians to-day farm less than they have at any time for the last fifteen years, and are less willing to do a day's work for the money than at any time for many years.

"There are very few who are not in debt. There is more drunkenness than at any time since I knew them. The gratuitous issues, along with their cash annuities and the lease money derived from leasing their allotments and renting their houses built for them by the Government, made their resources so large that they were not compelled to work for a living, and as they were not obliged to work they did not do so for recreation, and as they were idle they naturally fell into the habit of gambling and drinking as a pastime. * * * I heartily indorse the policy proposed by the Indian Office of giving them an opportunity to earn their own living and in furnishing them plenty of work to do."

These extracts could be multiplied, but those given are sufficient to show the trend of sentiment of those having an experimental knowledge of the situation.

We will all agree—those of us who know much about Indians—that the sooner the time arrives when it will be unnecessary to issue rations to any of them, the sooner the best good of the Indian race will be attained.

The gentleman from Ohio suggests as a second step forward to do away with the reservation. He is in accord with the chairman in that regard, with the Indian Rights Association, with the board of Indian commissioners, with the Mohonk conference, with the Indian Office, with the Committee on Indian Affairs. We all think alike upon that. We believe the sooner the reservation is done away with, and the lands which are suitable for cultivation allotted to the Indians in severalty, the sooner the Indian will become a respectable, self-supporting citizen of our Republic.

We are progressing rapidly—rapidly when you consider the people with whom we have to deal—toward that goal. In the report of the Commissioner for this year, a part of which I will print in my remarks, is set forth in detail the progress which has been made in allotments during the last year, and it shows that thousands and thousands of allotments have been made during the year to individual Indians.

ALLOTMENTS AND PATENTS.

The progress in allotment work since the last annual report is as follows:

ALLOTMENTS ON RESERVATIONS.

During the year patents have been issued and delivered to the following Indians:

Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache, in Oklahoma	2,957
Omaha, in Nebraska	19
Sioux, Lower Brulé Reservation, in South Dakota	1
Sioux, Rosebud Reservation, in South Dakota	3,104
Wichita and affiliated bands, in Oklahoma	956
Winnebago, in Nebraska	268

Allotments have been approved by this office and the Department as follows:

Chippewa of Lake Superior, on the Bad River Reservation, Wis.	352

Schedules of the following allotments have been received in this office, but have not been finally acted upon:

Sioux of the Cheyenne River Reservation, S. Dak.	259
Sioux of the Rosebud Reservation, S. Dak.	350

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. ALEXANDER. How many reservations are there similar to the one the gentleman speaks of in the vicinity of Fort Defiance?

Mr. SHERMAN. Some part of nearly all the reservations is nearly as bad as the Navaho Reservation. My friend from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], who has seen more of the reservations of the country than I have, tells me that all of the reservations in the Southwest, those in Arizona, New Mexico, Colorado, and Utah are very similar, some of them worse than the Navaho Reservation which I have described. The Navaho Reservation I described from personal observation, a personal visit made at a comparatively recent date.

Now, we are progressing toward allotment, allotment to all Indians individually, and are doing away with the reservation system; but we will not reach that point where all the Indian reservations are allotted to invidual members of the tribe; I fear we will not reach it during the life of the youngest man upon the floor of this House to-day; but we hope to reach it; those who desire that the Indian shall become a self-supporting citizen will use every effort to reach that goal, and we welcome the assistance of the gentleman from Ohio in bringing about that result.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LITTLE. I will yield the gentleman such time as he desires.

Mr. SHERMAN. The distinguished gentleman from Ohio discusses as his third proposition the educational problem. We have spent vast amounts of money, Mr. Chairman, in educating the Indians. This bill carries an appropriation of $3,000,000 for schools. We provide for the education not simply of A B C in the "three R's," reading, writing, and arithmetic, but we provide for the practical education in many, many ways. We maintain at Chilocco a school where we teach agriculture. At Hampton there is taught the business of blacksmithing and wagon making, capenter work, and all sorts of trades which the Indian is capable of mastering and which he will need, not only for his own support when he goes back to his reservation or his home, but which he will find of great value in elevating the other members of his tribe or his race.

The reservation school does much for the elevation of the younger Indian. It does more than to teach him to read and to write and to cipher. It is a civilizer, not merely an educator. It is the nonreservation schools that are manual-training schools; but in the reservation schools the Indians are taught the little homely ways of home life, which many of them never would be taught in their own homes, in their own cabins, or in their own tents or tepees.

The education that the Government has given the Indians during the last thirty years at the cost of numberless millions of dollars is, I believe, the most potential factor in elevating the Indian race, which my friend from Ohio admits is elevated to-day far above the position which it occupied twenty or thirty years ago. The percentage of Indians who to-day live in their homes is vastly greater than it was twenty years ago—out of sight beyond what it was thirty years ago. The percentage of Indians who to-day make their livelihood by tilling the soil is vastly greater than it was twenty-five years ago. And this advance has come from the help that the Government has given the Indians either in education in the school or in education at their homes.

And the education that the Government gives to the Indian is not confined within the walls of a schoolhouse, either on or off the reservation. We provide—and there is an appropriation of $65,000 for that object in the bill now pending—farmers, practical farmers, who go about from reservation to reservation teaching the Indian how to plow, how to reap, how to care for their cattle, how to care for their crops, how to build houses, how to mend wagons, how to do all the innumerable little "odds and ends" necessary to a successful farming life.

We provide an appropriation here of $25,000 to employ matrons, who go about from house to house and reservation to reservation and teach the women and the girls of the Indian race the arts of housekeeping; show them how to cook, show them the necessary sanitary precautions to be taken to keep their homes healthy and to make them attractive to the male members of the family, teach them how to wash, teach them all the homely, everyday, necessary duties of housework. Twenty-five thousand dollars a year we spend for that object, and I believe we do not expend anything for the Indians from which a greater return is received for the outlay than we receive from this appropriation for the matrons.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, I have in a general way covered the main subjects which have been discussed with so much lucidity by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio. His desire is the desire of the members of the Indian Committee. His goal is the goal of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and I join with him in commendation of the gentleman who now occupies that position, as I do in commendation of his efficient and worthy and honorable predecessor. Not within the time that I have had to do with Indian affairs has the office been occupied by any other than a conscientious and an able and an industrious citizen of this country. It is so occupied to-day.

Doubtless during many years some frauds have crept into the Indian service. But, Mr. Chairman, tell me in what branch of the public service of this Government, or any other, fraud has never crept in. True, conditions have arisen here and there which we deplore, which we wish might not have arisen. But when conditions have been discovered which ought not to exist they have been stamped out; they have been corrected. An honest effort has been made to honestly administer the trusts imposed by Congress and by the laws with reference to the Indian tribes.

I agree with the distinguished gentleman from Ohio; we have been a liberal people; we have been good stewards; we have been faithful guardians, as a whole. Mistakes we have made; errors not only of judgment, but individual dishonesty has crept in. But whenever discovered it has been stamped out, and stamped out quickly; so that to-day the Indian service, as my distinguished friend from Ohio states, is on a plane higher than it has ever been before—is reaching forward, pressing forward, stepping forward toward the goal which he desires us to reach, and to which all of us, whether in or out of the halls of Congress who have the best good of the Indians at heart, or who have the honor of our country at heart, desire to attain.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman allow me to make an inquiry before he takes his seat?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] stated a few moments ago, I believe, that 100 per cent of the Stockbridge Indians were self-sustaining. Will the gentleman please state how that is, and why they are self-sustaining and others are not, and if they have been treated differently from others, what is the difference?

Mr. SHERMAN. There is the same difference between various Indian tribes that there is between white people. There are some that reach a higher plane of civilization than others, some that have lived nearer white people, that have been where they have seen how to work, have learned by observation, not simply by the teachings of a schoolroom or of an occasional visitor, and those tribes have advanced higher in civilization than others. Besides this, there are tribes which have been so located that they could obtain from the soil the necessaries of life, and there are others that can not, because the soil will not produce without irrigation.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I understand from the speech of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] that the reservation policy is that the white man is excluded from the reservation and the Indians are prohibited from going off the reservation. Assuming that intercourse with the white people enlightens the Indian and makes him self-sustaining, does not the gentleman think the reservation policy a bad policy?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that at the earliest possible moment we should do away with all reservations and allot the lands in severalty to the Indians, providing in the allotment, of course, a certain time within which it will not be possible for the Indians to alienate their lands.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I believe there is no one on this side of the House who desires to be heard; at least I have no notice of it. I shall desire to be heard for a short time in the five-minute debate, but I think there is no further desire for debate on this side of the House at this time, and I will depend upon the indulgence of the committee to extend my time as much as I desire under the five-minute rule.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest, then, that by unanimous consent the general debate be closed, and that we proceed to the reading of the bill.

Mr. LITTLE. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas has one hour and seventeen minutes to his credit.

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; but I have no desire to use the time.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection, the Clerk will proceed to read the bill under the five-minute rule.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the White Earth Agency, Minn., $1,800.

Mr. BURTON. I move to strike out the last word. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to what I think is an error in the enumeration of these agencies in the second line on page 2. I wish to ask whether that number should not be 32 instead of 40? The number has been diminished somewhat from last year.

Mr. SHERMAN. The number has been diminished from that carried by the bill of last year and the total in the bill has been diminished.

Mr. BURTON. I think it will appear that the number is not 40 but 32.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I think an error has been made in printing. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] desires to offer an amendment, and after that is disposed of then I will offer an amendment to make any change necessary in the total number, and that will cover the correction suggested by the gentleman from Ohio.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 18, page 4, insert "at the Yankton, S. Dak., Agency, $1,600."
In line 19, page 4, strike out the word "two" and insert the word "eight;" strike out the word "seven" and insert the word "eight."

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. LACEY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. BARNES, one of his secretaries, who informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:
On January 23, 1903:
H. R. 622. An act granting a pension to Dicey Woodall;

On January 24, 1903:
H. R. 6326. An act for the relief of Hiram G. Walker.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.
The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments. Is a separate vote demanded upon any amendment? If not, the Chair will submit the amendments in gross.
Mr. LITTLE. I desire to ask if these are the committee amendments?
Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. This is the committee amendment adopted by the Committee on Indian Affairs.
Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose that amendment. One of the most commendable features in the management of the Indian Bureau is that they have lopped off a number of these superfluous Indian agencies. I should like to inquire the number of the Indians at that agency in Iowa. It is only a few hundred.
Mr. SHERMAN. About 400.
Mr. BURTON. That is a good illustration. There is an agency in Tama County, Iowa, where there are about 400 Indians in a fair state of civilization. They have a school there. They are surrounded by civilized influences and are making good progress. There is a provision that the superintendent of the school may do the work of the Indian agent.

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs has recommended that that agency, for one, be lopped off. I have no doubt that that is a good illustration of all the rest. Let us just see what we would be doing. We would be putting an Indian agent where there is already an Indian school with a superintendent and a large number of assistants, and pay him a salary of $1,500 just to take care of less than 400 Indians. I do not like to intrude my judgment upon that of the committee here, but I am satisfied, from conversation with officials in the Indian Department and others, that it would be a backward step to restore any of these agents included in the amendment. It would be a very good plan to have a time detector or some other device provided for those already in the bill, so that we may know where they are and what they are doing.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Are you aware of the fact that under the present law, as the law exists, that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior may designate a superintendent of schools if he thinks there is any need for one at the agency?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Now, that is the law at the present time, and the Committee on Indian Affairs, in considering this question, determined that perhaps it would not be advisable to do away with the appropriation for agents at this time, in view of the fact that if it should appear that the agents were necessary an agent might be appointed, and at all of these agencies but one there is at the present time an agent.

Mr. BURTON. I am perfectly aware of that. I would like to ask the gentleman a question in turn. Has not the Commissioner of Indian Affairs recommended that these agencies be discontinued?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I think the Commissioner of Indian Affairs has.

Mr. BURTON. Now, just a few words more. I think, Mr. Chairman, that we ought to decide right here on these items, and what we will do with them, whether we will go counter to the recommendations of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, who is best fitted to know the needs of the service, and who has recommended the discontinuance of these agencies. Shall we take a backward step and put them in at their respective salaries, particularly when one of them supervises less than 400 Indians.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the committee.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 34, noes 15.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers on that vote.

The question was taken on ordering tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. Nineteen gentlemen have arisen—not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move, in line 2, page 2, to strike out the word "forty" and insert the word "thirty-seven."

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 2, strike out "forty" and insert "thirty-seven."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For contingencies of the Indian Service, including traveling and incidental expenses of Indian agents and of their offices, and of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs; also traveling and incidental expenses of 5 special agents, at $3 per day when actually employed on duty in the field, exclusive of transportation and sleeping-car fare, in lieu of all other expenses now authorized by law, and expenses of going to and going from the seat of government, and while remaining there under orders and direction of the Secretary of the Interior, for a period not to exceed twenty days; for pay of employees not otherwise provided for, and for pay of the 5 special agents, at $2,000 per annum each, $40,000: Provided, That $5,000 of this sum, or so much thereof as in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior may be deemed necessary, may be used for the introduction of the willow industry among Indian tribes and on Indian reservations where it may be deemed feasible.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, beginning with the word "Provided," in line 5, all of lines 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 7, beginning with the word "Provided," in line 5, strike out all down to and including the word "feasible," in line 10.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do that, Mr. Chairman, because the item was in last year's bill—put on in the floor, if I remember aright—and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs informs me nothing was done under it.

Mr. LITTLE. My recollection is that it was stricken out in the committee, but was put in by an error in the printing.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For expenses of the commission of citizens serving without compensation, appointed by the President under the provisions of the act of April 10, 1869, $4,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 7, line 14, after the words "four thousand dollars," insert:

"Of which sum an amount not to exceed $300 may be paid for the rent of an office for said commission: And it is provided further, That from the appropriation already made for the expenses of this commission for the current fiscal year ending July 1, 1903, an amount not to exceed $300 may be paid for office rent for that year."

Mr. SHERMAN. The purpose of that amendment is this: The Auditor of the Treasury has decided that no part of the appropriation can be used for office rent. This is to correct that condition.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to employ practical farmers and practical stockmen in addition to the agency farmers now employed, at wages not exceeding $65 each per month, to superintend and direct farming and stock raising among such Indians as are making effort for self-support, $125,000.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I move in line 20 to strike out "one hundred and twenty-five" and substitute "seventy-five."

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 20, page 7, strike out "one hundred and twenty-five" and insert "seventy-five."

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, $75,000 is the amount in the last bill, and it seems to me sufficient for this service. I will say, more than that, I feel disposed to oppose every item here which involves an increase of expenditure unless some very valid reason can be given. In the bill of the preceding year it was $75,000. In 1901 it was $65,000; in 1900, the same amount as in 1901. There was a provision some years ago that these farmers should be selected either from the State in which they are to serve or from some State bordering upon it. For some reason that seems to have been omitted.

Now, we have a system of schools which is attended by something over 20,000 Indian pupils. There is an elaborate course of six years in agriculture as a part of their course of study. One of two things ought to be done. Either you ought to abandon the elaborate, expensive, and lengthy course of instruction in agriculture for students or you ought to strike this out. This $125,000 would provide for something like 150, if they are employed the year round, to go about from reservation to reservation. Let us bear in mind that on each reservation there are instructors and agents and men who are paid large salaries to give this very kind of teaching.

Where are we tending in this? Are we to have Indian instruction on every farm on which there is an Indian farmer? The instructors in farming would be able under this provision to give to each Indian farm a certain amount of time each year. There are, according to the census statistics, 19,800 Indian farms. This would enable him to visit every one in a year. I submit that not only was this a proposition of doubtful propriety in the first instance, but it certainly should not be increased from $75,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I hardly see how an appropriation that provides for 150 men would furnish 1 instructor for each farmer in a population of 175,000, but I am not a mathematician. The gentleman from Ohio I guess is, or he could not figure that out. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in his statement to the subcommittee which prepared this bill, was exceedingly urgent that this increased item be included in the bill. In his judgment there is no branch of the service that does more practical good than these farmers, practical farmers. The Commissioner states that it is not possible for the Indian agent to go all over his reservation once a year, or perhaps once in two years, and if he did he could simply make a cursory and hurried visit to various individuals; and the desire is to locate these farmers where each one would have 30, 40, or 50 families upon whom he could make frequent visits during the entire year and give them constant instruction.

I think that my friend's argument that because we are teaching the young Indians of the various tribes in the schools that therefore it is unnecessary to teach those who are left at home on the reservations—those beyond school age—anything, is not well founded. I believe, Mr. Chairman, and the Indian Commissioner believes, that there is no expenditure provided for in this bill that does more practical good than this and the appropriation for matrons, and there is nothing for which he is more urgent. I trust the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio will not prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was considered, and rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For permanent annuity for support of light horsemen, per thirteenth article of treaty of October 18, 1820, and thirteenth article of treaty of June 22, 1855, $600.

For permanent annuity for support of blacksmith, per sixth article of treaty of October 18, 1820, ninth article of treaty of January 20, 1825, and thirteenth article of treaty of June 22, 1855, $600.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words. I do so for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee what that proviso means—what is intended by "light horsemen." Was it originally a military or police provision?

The CHAIRMAN. That is my understanding, and it is used for that purpose still.

Mr. BURTON. I would like to ask if he has any information how the position is filled at this time, by a white man or Indian, or whether it is filled at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. Whether it is filled at the present time I can not say. It was filled two years ago. Frankly, I at one time went over with great care all the treaty provisions with the Commissioner and his chiefs of the law division and of the finance division, so that I knew just who were employed and for what, but the data I have not at hand here now. Whether this particular position is now filled, and whether by a white man or an Indian, I am unable to say. It is, however, a treaty provision.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to carry out an act entitled "An act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota," approved January 14, 1889, namely, the purchase of material and employment of labor for the erection of houses for Indians; for the purchase of agricultural implements, stock, and seeds, breaking and fencing land; for payment of expenses of delegations of Chippewa Indians to visit the White Earth Reservation; for the erection and maintenance of day and industrial schools; for subsistence and for pay of employees; for pay of commissioner and his expenses, and for removal of Indians and for their allotments, to be reimbursed to the United States out of the proceeds of sale of their lands, $150,000.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I may not be correctly informed in regard to this provision, but I should like to be corrected if I am not. As I understand, a treaty was made with these Chippewas to the effect, first, that these lands should be sold, the Government holding the proceeds as trustee, and that when the amount should reach $3,000,000 there should be paid to them interest each year at 5 per cent. This would give them $150,000 a year. There is a further provision that until this fund realized from the sale of the lands should reach $3,000,000 these Indians should be paid $90,000 per annum, to be reimbursed from the balance in excess of the $3,000,000. Now, if such be the case, why should not this payment of $90,000 per annum be abandoned, or has there been a further agreement or contract with the Indians which justifies the payment of both amounts in one year?

Mr. SHERMAN. Has the gentleman a copy of the treaty before him?

Mr. BURTON. I have not. It is to be found in the statutes of 1889, being volume 25 of the Statutes at Large, page 645.

Mr. SHERMAN. In section 7 of that act the gentleman will find this language:

The United States shall, for the benefit of said Indians, advance to them as such interest as aforesaid the sum of $90,000 annually, counting from the time when the removal and allotments provided for in this act shall have been made until such time as said permanent fund, exclusive of the deductions hereinbefore provided for, shall equal or exceed the sum of $3,000,000.

Mr. BURTON. This is the point that I am making—that the $90,000 a year was a temporary provision, to continue until the fund should equal or exceed $3,000,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is right.

Mr. BURTON. And then they were to receive their $150,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is right.

Mr. BURTON. But here you have a provision for the payment of both the $90,000 and the $150,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. The $150,000 is discretionary; there is no doubt about that under the terms of the treaty as I have read it. But if we appropriate for their needs and make the payment reimbursable, then when this fund is of sufficient amount (if it ever is) to reimburse us, we shall receive the money back again. We are advised that the condition of those Indians is such that we must come to their relief by an appropriation or they will suffer or starve. Now, the simple question is whether we shall make provision in this form, it being possible, although not certain, that the fund may reach an amount sufficient to reimburse us; or if we do not put it in this form, then shall we put it in as a gratuity; or shall we let the Indians starve?

Mr. BURTON. Does the gentleman know the amount of that fund at this time?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes. The amount is $1,233,584.12.

Mr. BURTON. Do I understand that both of these payments are to be reimbursed to the United States from the proceeds——

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; when it reaches $3,000,000.

Mr. BURTON. Could not this question arise: If these payments are made without agreement or treaty, might not the defense be raised by the Indians that the amount is not reimbursable?

Mr. SHERMAN. But it is made so under the treaty. Here is the provision:

Provided, That Congress may, in its discretion, from time to time during the said period appropriate, for the purpose of promoting civilization and self-support among the said Indians, a portion of said principal sum, not exceeding 5 per cent thereof.

Mr. BURTON. That is, of the annuity; it is not of the principal sum, is it?

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, yes; it is of the principal sum. It so states.

Mr. BURTON. The sole question in my mind is whether there is authority to disburse this amount and then obtain reimbursement from the proceeds of these lands.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the gentleman from Ohio would not have the least question about that if he would read this statute confirming the treaty. I shall be glad to hand the book to the gentleman. By the language of that provision, which I have just read, we are expressly authorized in our discretion to appropriate of the principal sum, not of the interest——

Mr. BURTON. Does the gentleman understand that language as meaning 5 per cent of the amount on hand (which is now about $1,000,000) or 5 per cent of the ultimate amount?

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand 5 per cent of the $3,000,000; and it seems to me that the $3,000,000 will probably be eventually exhausted with these 5 per cent appropriations.

Mr. BURTON. Is it not true that the $3,000,000 is an amount which may be realized, on the one hand, or may never be realized? You have realized as yet only about $1,000,000, as you say.

Mr. SHERMAN. Exclusive of expenses, a million and a quarter.

Mr. BURTON. What basis have you to compute this 5 per cent as on the $3,000,000, when that is an amount you may never obtain?

Mr. SHERMAN. The basis is 5 per cent on the principal sum (which the statute fixes at $3,000,000). As a matter of fact, the administration of the law relating to timber upon that reservation has been very faulty, to use a mild term. In the closing days of the last session of Congress the statute was amended by a bill commonly called the Morris bill, under which a different method is adopted in disposing of the timber lands, and under which the Indian Office or the Land Office, I do not remember which at this minute, estimated that we would receive something over $10,000,000 in all human probability, for the timber.

Mr. BURTON. On the assurance of the gentleman from New York I will withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio withdraws the amendment, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of physician, 2 teachers, 2 carpenters, 1 miller, 2 farmers, a blacksmith, and engineer, per seventh article of the treaty of May 10, 1858, $9,000; in all, $99,000.

Mr. BURTON. I move to strike out the last four words. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs how this $90,000 for subsistence and civilization is to be expended?

Mr. SHERMAN. Under the terms of the agreement, that is disbursed in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. BURTON. I would call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that this seems a considerable amount. There are only 1,396 persons in this tribe, and this first item is somewhat in excess of $60 apiece.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, it is a treaty stipulation. It is not a gratuity.

Mr. BURTON. Is it not a treaty stipulation in which the amount to be paid is left in a measure discretionary with the President or the Secretary of the Interior, according to their necessities, or is it an absolute amount?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it is not an absolute amount; I think it is for their subsistence and civilization.

Mr. BURTON. Could the chairman of the committee state whether this is an increase or a decrease from the amount of the previous year?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is neither. It is the same that it has been for several years.

Mr. BURTON. I want to call the attention of the chairman of the committee also to the fact that, appearing on page 692 of the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for the year 1901, not one person on this agency sustains himself by labor in civilized pursuits; none by hunting, fishing, or root gathering; that 100 per cent subsist by Government rations.

Mr. SHERMAN. That 100 per cent is pretty nearly all of them.

Mr. BURTON. It would seem that 100 per cent would include them all.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. BURTON. And I want to say, while I shall not press this amendment, it seems to me it is a very dangerous experiment to continue appropriating something over $60 per head. It is nearer seventy when you count in the amount for physician, 2 teachers, 2 carpenters, 1 miller, 2 farmers, a blacksmith, and an engineer. When we have for twenty-five years and more been expending that amount, and there is not a single self-supporting Indian on the whole reservation, according to the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, it seems to me it is not a good thing to continue.

I want to call attention to another fact, that there are provided here 2 carpenters, 1 miller, 2 farmers, a blacksmith, and an engineer; and I can not see the necessity for a blacksmith or two farmers, when the Indians belonging to the agency do no farming themselves. It would seem that this provision supported those two farmers in lonely isolation there for no especially good purpose.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, it would appear that there might be some improvement in the administration of this provision, in the expenditure of this money; that it might be possible, by adopting the methods that have been adopted in the Sioux country, to advance these Indians. It appears from the report the gentleman has read that they have not advanced; but the amount, I believe, is necessary for their maintenance at the present time. The Indian Office so declares to the committee, and it is the same amount that has been appropriated, as the gentleman states, for some time. I think it is more than likely, if the attention of the office is directed to this particular item and a suggestion made that the policy adopted in the Crow country be applied here, that they will attempt to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio withdraw his amendment?

Mr. BURTON. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

POTTAWATOMIES.

For permanent annuity, in silver, per fourth article of treaty of August 3, 1795, $357.80;

For permanent annuity, in silver, per third article of treaty of September 30, 1809, $178.90;

For permanent annuity, in silver, per third article of treaty of October 2, 1818, $534.50;

For permanent annuity, in money, per second article of treaty of September 20, 1828, $715.60;

For permanent annuity, in specie, per second article of treaty of July 29, 1829, and second article of treaty of September 20, 1828, $5,724.77;

For permanent provision for payment of money in lieu of tobacco, iron, and steel, per second article of treaty of September 20, 1828, and tenth article of treaties of June 5 and 17, 1846, $107.34;

For permanent provision for three blacksmiths and assistants, and for iron and steel for shops, per third article of treaty of October 16, 1826; second article of treaty of September 20, 1828, and second article of treaty of July 29, 1829, $1,008.99;

For permanent provision for 50 barrels of salt, per second article of treaty of July 29, 1829, $50;

For interest on $230,064.20, at 5 per cent, in conformity with provisions of article 7 of treaties of June 5 and 17, 1846, $11,503.21; in all, $20,541.11.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out that portion of the bill for the Pottawatomies, beginning at line 20, page 15, and ending with line 9 on page 17. This provision more than almost any other in the bill shows how little effort has been made by the Indian Department to meet changed conditions. It shows the absolute necessity of entering into new agreements with the Indian tribes and making the policy of the Government more progressive. Now, here is the first statement in the clause:

For permanent annuity, in silver, per fourth article of the treaty of August 3, 1795, $357.80.

The reason this was inserted is clear enough, because in 1795 silver was the metallic money in use and the paper money was not of stable value. This annuity of $357.80 was to be paid in silver. Now, then, think of the absurdity of carrying along that provision at this time. I do not know how it may be. It may be the Indian agent solemnly takes up the $357.80 in silver coin and pays the Indians according to the provisions of a treaty 107 years old.

Mr. LACEY. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him, on the absurdity of the payment in silver, I will state that from 1861 until the resumption of specie payments it was made in silver, when there was a very large premium; and it is therefore carried in this form, because that was the agreement; and so long as silver is to remain as good as gold it is not hurting anybody, but is simply carrying out to the letter the terms of an agreement made a long time ago.

Mr. SHERMAN. The agreement was modified in 1818, and in that modified agreement there was the express provision that all the annuities continuing should be paid in silver. As a matter of fact all these payments are now made by check, but are we to strike it from this bill and say how we are to pay it before the Indians or we ask a modification of the agreement?

Mr. BURTON. Why not have expressed in the bill just exactly what you are doing?

Mr. SHERMAN. This wording follows the condition of the agreement.

Mr. BURTON. I give credit to the gentleman's fondness for tradition and for history in putting it in. I am only illustrating the absurdity of continuing the provision.

Mr. SHERMAN. The wording of the agreement ought to be followed.

Mr. BURTON. It is perfectly absurd.

Mr. SHERMAN. The wording may be absurd, but not following it.

Mr. BURTON. But the gentleman's committee ought to have changed it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I acknowledge the absurdity of the situation, but as long as the agreement stands the words should be here, and if the Indians are willing to accept instead of silver a check or draft it is all right. My understanding is that in fact it is so paid.

Mr. BURTON. On page 16, on lines 18 to 24, is this clause:

For permanent provision for three blacksmiths and assistants and for iron and steel for shops per third article of treaty of October 16, 1826; second article of treaty of September 20, 1828, and second article of treaty of July 29, 1829, $1,008.99.

Now, this tribe has dwindled to comparatively small numbers and has no occupation for three blacksmiths; and my information is it was provided that one of these blacksmiths should be maintained in the city of Chicago. The provision was made when Chicago was an outpost. I can not conceive why it is necessary to have a blacksmith for them in the city of Chicago.

Mr. MANN. There is plenty of room for him there.

Mr. BURTON. Yes; you need more blacksmiths and fewer of other occupations.

Mr. MANN. I may call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the Potawatomies claim to own all the lake front of Chicago, and they may need a great many blacksmiths before they get possession of the property.

Mr. BURTON. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs writes that there are not three any longer. There is one and an assistant; and yet this bill is carrying the provision for three blacksmiths. The terms of the treaty and the terms of the bill both alike are followed, by having one blacksmith and one assistant. That is followed by the provision, "For permanent provision for 50 barrels of salt, per second article of treaty of July 28, 1829, $50." I wonder if that salt is sent out to them now. What I maintain is that this bill is not a proper place to show the history of the Indian tribes. It should set forth for what we are making appropriations now, and be made to conform to present conditions.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me say with reference to that one item of making provision for 50 barrels of salt. That provision I find has been carried in the bill for something like $200 for a great many years—until five or six years ago, I think. Early in my service on the Indian Committee I looked over the various treaty items. There was this provision for 50 barrels of salt. It was in fact furnished or the cash given to the Indians. The item has been the same in amount for many years. In changing the item we got the price of salt per barrel at Chicago market, and continued it since at $50. The present price may be a little less now in this market than it was then. These various items have been gone over at one time and another with a good deal of care by the Indian committee. About the particular one that refers to the blacksmith I have no present recollection.

Mr. BURTON. I have a letter from the Commissioner on Indian Affairs, in which he states that there are two, and at least the assistant is an Indian; whether the principal one is an Indian or not I do not know.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have sent for the treaty to which the gentleman refers, and I find that the treaty provides for a blacksmith, not in Chicago, but "by the treaty of Chicago."

Mr. BURTON. Is it in the treaty that the blacksmith shop shall be maintained at Chicago?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have the treaty before me, but I have not time to run through the whole of it. The first item I come to provides for a blacksmith, as provided in a former treaty—"the treaty of Chicago."

Mr. BURTON. I think it is in a later treaty that it shall be maintained at Chicago.

Mr. MANN. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio if it is his intention to strike at the industries of Chicago by doing away with this blacksmith shop? [Laughter].

Mr. BURTON. Well, I am inclined to think that Chicago could get along without the blacksmith shop being provided for in the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN. If we have a right to it we want it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I assume that the gentleman from Ohio does not intend to press his amendment.

Mr. BURTON. Oh, no, I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Bannocks: For pay of physician, teacher, carpenter, miller, engineer, farmer, and blacksmith, as per tenth article of treaty of July 3, 1868, $5,000; in all, $11,000.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the provision from line 9, extending to line 12, page 20. I would like to ask the gentleman whether provision can be found in this treaty referred to for the maintenance of a physician, teacher, carpenter, miller, engineer, etc., or whether this is a gratuitous appropriation made in pursuance of the general plan for education. I have given a hasty examination to this treaty—and I have not been able to give much time to any of them—but it seems to be peculiarly drawn. There is an expression "that the United States shall furnish a physician, teachers, carpenters, etc., as herein provided," but I did not find in any other portion of the treaty an affirmative provision for these teachers. There is in section 3 a provision for houses for all the employees named.

Mr. SHERMAN. I find my reference to this to be 15 of the Statutes at Large, section 10, "United States agrees to furnish annually a physician, teacher, carpenter, miller, engineer, farmer, blacksmith as herein contemplated," referring to the treaty that preceded the enacting clause, page 1, further provides that such provision shall be made from time to time as will be sufficient to employ such persons.

Mr. BURTON. I want to call attention to the fact that I question whether any affirmative provision can be found in that treaty for the furnishing of these respective employees.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is found in section 10 of that treaty, page 936, of the Indian treaties.

Mr. BURTON. That is what the gentleman has just read.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; I read from the statute. The United States agrees to furnish to the Indians herein contemplated——

Mr. BURTON. Where is the provision referred to as "herein contemplated?"

Mr. SHERMAN. I presume it is in the preceding section.

Mr. BURTON. I would like to call attention of the gentleman to this and have him ask the Department to examine that treaty and see whether there is any affirmative provision of this kind.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will not only ask the Department to do so but I will do it myself. I have done it at some time, but I can not turn to the provision in a moment. There are a great many treaties as the gentleman knows, and they are more or less complicated, and it is difficult to carry them all in one's mind.

Mr. BURTON. There is to be found there, as I said a moment ago, another section in which it speaks of building houses for the respective employees, but in the time I have given to it I was unable to find any article in which there was an affirmative provision for the furnishing or support of these respective employees.

Mr. SHERMAN. I looked over all of the treaties at various times, spent a good deal of time in studying them some time ago, and satisfied myself of the correctness of them all; but since then I have not gone over them each year. For instance, as a result of that examination, on page 17, under the Quapaws, I found the provision for education under the third article that that was to be done during such time as the President thought that it was for the best interest of the Indians; so I had incorporated in the Indian bill the next year a provision which has been continued ever since.

It was a proviso reading, "Provided, That the President of the United States shall certify the same to be for the best interests of the Indians." That provision had never been in the bill before, as near as I could find. It was inserted two or three years ago. I called the attention of the committee to very many peculiar provisions of the treaties, and we attempted to correct any incongruities in former bills, and I think we did it in most cases—at any rate, we certainly intended to. While I can not, at this moment, turn to the provision to which the gentleman refers in regard to the Shoshones, I will not only look it up and call his attention to it, but will call the attention of the Indian Office to it.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to suggest to the gentleman that there are several other treaties made about that time—1868, I think—in which there seems to be the same phraseology and the same omission of the affirmative clause to which I have referred.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am obliged to the gentleman for calling my attention to it. If there is anything that ought not to be there, I wish it corrected.

Mr. BURTON. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For subsistence of the Sioux, and for purposes of their civilization, as per agreement ratified by act of Congress approved February 28, 1877, $851,000: Provided, That this sum shall include transportation of supplies from the termination of railroad or steamboat transportation, and in this service Indians shall be employed when practicable: And provided further, That the number of rations issued shall not exceed the number of Indians on each reservation, and any excess in the number of rations issued shall be disallowed in the settlement of the agent's account: Provided further, That the unexpended balance for the fiscal year 1903 is hereby appropriated and made available for 1904.

Mr. BURTON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 9 strike out "eight" and insert "four;" so as to read "$480,000;" and strike out at the end of the paragraph the following: "Provided further, That the unexpended balance for the year 1903 is hereby appropriated and made available for 1904."

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this item, which to a casual observer must appear the most extravagant in the whole bill, should be carefully explained to the House, so that we may know the reason for this very large appropriation. What is the number of these Indians? What progress are they making in civilization? Why is it that $850,000 is necessary for their subsistence? Because the language "for purposes of their civilization" may be regarded as thrown in, as is often the case with statutes and contracts, as surplusage. Why is this large appropriation necessary? If there was a balance left over from last year—that is, if $850,000 was more than sufficient last year—why should we this year appropriate $850,000 again?

Mr. SHERMAN. As a matter of fact, I made inquiry particularly at the Indian Office as to the amount of the unexpended balance of this appropriation, and the Commissioner advises me—

It is impossible at this time to even approximate the balance. If the present plans for the Sioux are carried out, it is predicted that the balance will be insignificant.

In other words, if the present plans be carried out to the end of the fiscal year, there will be required for that purpose all of the $850,000 heretofore appropriated.

There are twenty-odd thousand of these Sioux; some of them are self-supporting, some are not. It is amongst these Indians that the Commissioner is now doing the greatest amount of work toward abolishing the issuance of rations without labor. It is there that the Commissioner obtains from the Indians some manner of service to entitle them to the rations.

This sum is not greater, in the judgment of the Indian Office, than is required to properly care for these Indians as they have been cared for in the past—no better, no worse—better only in that service is now required of them, whereas service has heretofore not been required.

My judgment is based upon the judgment of the officials who administer the law, who expend the money. Their judgment, based upon many years of experience—five years under the present Commissioner—is that the sum appropriated last year and asked for again this year is no more than is necessary to meet the needs of the case.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I do not think we ought to allow this very large item to go by without some attention. It is stated by the gentleman from New York that there are about 20,000 of these Sioux. Here is an aggregate appropriation of $1,172,000. When we take out those Indians who are absent from the reservation, those who have farms in allotment, and make other deductions, it will appear that $60 apiece is being appropriated for these Indians. There was a professor in some college near Chicago who expressed the opinion last autumn that a family ought to get along on $300 a year. This statement was received with a great deal of disfavor. It was said to be cruel and thoughtless for a professor to make the statement that a family could live on $300 a year.

It is very evident from a good many provisions in this bill that the Indian Department wanted to utter their protest against that idea, for they have in some cases recommended for Indian tribes that have immense tracts of land and in some cases considerable quantities of cattle and sheep sums amounting to $300 a year and more per family.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, no.

Mr. BURTON. I can cite instances.

Mr. SHERMAN. The number of these Sioux, which I put in round figures at 20,000, is about 27,000, which would make about $100 per family.

Mr. BURTON. The gentleman's statement a few moments ago was 20,000; but take the number as 27,000. An appropriation of $1,172,000 for that number would be about $40 apiece, or $200 per family. In addition to that, these Indians have an immense reservation. They are preferred (and this is by statute) in employment. Special effort is made by the Government to give them teaming to do. Yet, with all these facts in view, we are paying for their subsistence and civilization $200 per family—about $40 apiece. It does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that this ought to stop. I take it it has been going on at this figure for many years, and unless we put some brake upon it—unless we say that $1,172,000 is too much for this Indian tribe—it will go on indefinitely, not through any fault of the committee—I want to disclaim especially any attack on the Committee on Indian Affairs.

I repeat what I said a while ago, that if any criticism is to be raised against them it is because they have too implicitly adopted the recommendations made by the Department; and the criticism that rests upon the Indian Department is that, recognizing this extravagance, recognizing that the policy which has been pursued is all wrong, they have gone on perfunctorily—almost automatically—sending in year by year these very large recommendations.

Mr. Chairman, if no further discussion is desired, I ask for a vote on the proposed amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I trust the amendment will not prevail.

As I stated a moment ago, the judgment of the administrative officer who has had charge of this matter for more than five years is that the sum now proposed to be appropriated is only adequate. I do not care whether the proviso which the gentleman proposes to strike out be left in or not, because there will be practically no surplus or unexpended balance for the present year; but I trust that the amendment reducing by one-half the amount proposed to be appropriated will not prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and maintenance of day and industrial schools, including purchase, erection, and repairs of school buildings, in accordance with Article VII of the treaty of April 29, 1868, which article is continued in force for twenty years by section 17 of the act of March 2, 1889, $225,000; in all, $1,172,000.

Mr. BURTON. I move to strike out the last clause of that. I should like to ask in regard to this what the number of scholars is who are benefited by this expenditure of $225.000? Also, in the report filed is this $225,000 included in the expense of the education of the Indians, or is it a separate item?

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not quite understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. BURTON. In the first place, how many Indians are benefited by it; how many are attending school?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will tell the gentleman in a moment. I will have to look it up.

Mr. BURTON. The second question is this: Is this item of $225,000 for education included in the general estimate for education of the Indians, or is this a separate item?

Mr. SHERMAN. This is a separate item, provided for in this treaty, which makes specific provision in reference to it. For instance, the United States, under that treaty, agree that for every 30 children between 6 and 15 years of age a house shall be provided and a teacher obtained to teach the elementary branches of English education, etc. And under the act of 1889, for twenty years from and after the time that act took effect, that provision is continued in force. The number of children of school age amongst the Sioux I will have to find in the report here, which will take a few moments. I should suppose that the number would be four thousand, perhaps more, in the various Sioux tribes; not less than four thousand.

Mr. BURTON. In what State or States?

Mr. SHERMAN. They are mostly in South Dakota. They are scattered. There are some in Nebraska and some in North Dakota and some in Montana, but the great bulk of the Sioux tribe is in South Dakota.

It will take some few minutes to hunt up from the various places in the report the exact number of children of school age in the Sioux tribe, but I will get them for the gentleman in a few minutes.

Mr. BURTON. May I ask whether in the amount given in your report for education, this $3,000,000, that sum is included?

Mr. SHERMAN. The large amount for school purposes to which you refer is a gratuity and has no reference to these treaty sums.

Mr. BURTON. And is exclusive of this item?

Mr. SHERMAN. And is exclusive of these treaty provisions.

Mr. BURTON. Does this treaty provide for any determination of this provision for schools?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, twenty years from 1889.

Mr. BURTON. There is one point about which the gentleman has given me no information. That is as to the number of children of school age.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will get it in a moment. It is 5,383.

Mr. BURTON. I withdraw the amendment, then.

The Clerk read as follows:

SPOKANES.

For pay of a blacksmith and carpenter to do necessary work and to instruct the said Indians in those trades, $1,000 each, per sixth article of said agreement, $2,000.

Mr. BURTON. I move to strike out the last word. I would call the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] to the fact that there is no reference to what agreement this is, unless it refers to the preceding Sioux-Yankton tribe, which can hardly be. The language of this section is "per sixth article of said agreement." That occurs in line 15. There is no agreement referred to.

Mr. SHERMAN. That should be supplied. I will offer an amendment correcting that. I can not do it at this moment, but I will prepare an amendment to correct that. I ask unanimous consent that that be informally passed.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection it will be passed over.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and maintenance of day and industrial schools, including purchase, erection, and repairs of school buildings, in accordance with article 7, of the treaty of April 29, 1868, which article is continued in force for twenty years by section 17 of the act of March 2, 1889. $225,000; in all, $1,172,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. DALZELL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. GROSVENOR, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15804) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. 15704) for raising revenue and other purposes was withdrawn from the further consideration of the Committee on Ways and Means and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. SCOTT for one week, on account of important business.
